Melinda Quintos de Jesus described a media intervention in support of peace, which has recently been undertaken in the Philippines.

Southern participants were lacking

I his intervention has oppured in the continue of long seasons of unhigher antique of Muslim militarits, the Communist Party, right-wing military rebalts and groups of indigenous people. Some of these groups have peace agreements in placement stip of seath government. There is, a givic committee that opened agreements in the contract of the contract opened agreement and a line opened agreement and a line of the contract opened agreement and a line opened agreement and a line opened agreement agreement and a line of the contract opened agreement agreement agreement and a line opened agreement a

However, the Press was not supporting the peace process. Reporting was more consensed with peace breakdowns than with promoting and reporting on peace agreements. An organization was formed called the Alliance for Peace Communications, which established the first Zone of Peace in the Mountain Province. This was a dramatic event, journalists gathered to reflect on why the media was not gowering peace calcued exent and inspectation.

A resonwais supplied and resonant to government, identifying gaps in the information of provided and residue in education of "content analysis" was developed, and used to evaluate the media's role in peace-building. Using this there was an overactual was nested in peace reporting were identified. It was felt that it was necessary to communicate with educirs to express the need for more contextualization of conflict/peace stories.

Follow-up has not yet been possible for financial reasons, but a publication is in process

From this experience it was concluded that one can achieve results with a phased, multifaceted, modular, flexible approach. It is hoped that by educating journalists in peace subjects, more stones of reconciliation will emerge.

Overall it is important to develop a new cultural sensitivity amongst journalists, who should be encouraged to recognize that part of their role in society is to species communities with a history of war, and to contribute to the building of a culture of peace
