ANDY O'HARA BY THE AUTHOR OF THE MISIONARY'S SON. CHAPTER XIII.

CONCLUSION.

It was with no common emotions that Andy endured the absence of Edward Vincent. The sickness and danger of his dear friend was the one thought that engrossed his attention, his soul was now wrapt up in Fred, who, far away, lay groaning on his bed of pain.

From the time in which Fred was first stricken down he never raised his head. He was carried up to his bed, and there the violence of his fever raged uncontrolled. Now the weakness that had been increasing for years became evident, ann he sank more rapidly than he would have done in strength. Th cines which were given him served to reduce him still further, and at the end of a single week there was but little hope of his life.

Poor Fred! In the delirium of his fever his affectionate and gentle nature was beautifully displayed. His mind wandered to the loved scenes of college life, to his friends, and to Andy. Memory brought back the events of the past few years, and all the thoughts and feelings that had been most dear now filled his mind again. In his lucid intervals he would mournfully ask pardon of his friends for the trouble he gave them, and entreat them to put themselves to no uneasiness on his account. In one of these moments he saw his brother, who had just arrived Lome; and eagerly enquired after the friends at college. Thus his heart seemed to cling to the recollection of that happy life.

A week's illness found him reduced to the lowest stage of weakness. The skill and kind attention of his friends were all taxed to the utmost, but in vain. There was one evening on which he roused himself, and seemed so cheerful and so strong that his friends were radiant with hope, and even the physician was deceived; but it soon passed away, leaving him worse

Edward Vincent sat by the bedside of his bro ther. The disease had done its work, and Fred's gentle spirit was rapidly nearing the shores of the dark river; and now, while the forces of the body were growing weak, the disease seemed to loose its hold of his mind, which gleaned forth bright and calm.

'Is it day yet ?" he asked faintly. Yes it is six o'clock in the morning."

" I thought it was so dark," he replied faintly. " Freddy," said his father in a choking voice

" do you know where you are going?" A heavenly smile illumined his face; he mur-" Home!"

Edward felt a thrill pass through him as he gazed upon his brother. Ah, thought he, I would willingly change places with him to have so strong a confidence in immortal happiness.
Fred's lips moved. They all bent down to "Think of me as happy-and-do-not-

His voice died away, but a smile remained, stranger.

One by one the members of the graduating class, arose to speak. It was not a large class, for there were not over thirty students in the whole college; but the members of it were all young men of rare ab.lity. There were but five in all, Conford, Vincent, Lawton, Blair, and 51, Prince William Street, St. John, N. B. One by one the members of the graduating for there were not over thirty students in the whole college; but the members of it were all young men of rare ab.lity. There were but five in all, Conford, Vincent, Lawton, Blair, and Andy O'Hara. Conford was confessedly at the head of the class; but Andy was inferior to none of them in solid but thorough attainments. He was an eloquent exposition of the plans, hopes, and aims of missions.

Vincent and the others spoke on kindred subjects. All the speeches were deeply imbued with religious sentiments. Their late experience had produced a deep and lasting effect upon them.

Last of all Andy O'Hara spoke. His subject was "Special Providence." His speech was no discussion of generalities, but a warm and thrilling description of facts. Never before had he spoken with such deep emotion and with such wonderful effect. He did not hesitate to bring forth the great facts in his own life. He knew that forth the great facts in his own life. He knew that they were the strongest proofs of the truth and loving-kindness of his heavenly Father that he could bring forward.

His warm Irish nature breathed itself forthin every word, that same Irish nature which has been the groundwork of the fiery elequence of so WE HAVE RECEIVED OUIS many great orators. Andy held the audience enchained. They gave themselves up to his influence. Not a sound was heard as he spoke ex-cept the thrilling tones of his voice, and when he

A short conversation followed. And now a gentlemen, who had been eagerly forcing his way through the crowd, came, up to Andy. Touching him gently on the shoulder, he said : " Andy !"

The voice was very familiar. Andy turned in stantaneously. It was a dear, a long-remember. ed fried.

"Mr. Trueman!" he cried, and in a moment The hymn was ended. The eye of the dying youth was turned up to heaven. It was a thril-ling moment. His pale, thin face, white lips, and look of ecstacy, his eyes, in which now a he grasped the outstre ched hand of his friend. Scarcely ever in his life before had Andy experienced such heartfelt joy as now. The friend of his youth, of his ignorance, of his darkness and poverty, was now here in the day of his re-joicing. And Mr. Trueman shared his joy, for tears of gladness and emotion filled his eyes, supernatural fire burned, formed a spectacle which moved them all. He raised his bands It was his last word. Vincent, Lawton, and Blair are all pastors. The first is in the city church, the others in ountry places. All are devoted and successful ninisters.

Andy, with his brother and sister, went to settle with Mr. Trueman at F. there knew him and loved him well, He went to be their pastor.

There he has labored ever since, and there he still labors. He sees hundreds around him who owe to him, under God, their knowledge of the truth. He often sees his old college friends, with whom he is united in affection as strong as ever. He looks back upon his past life as a strange instance of the wondrous ways of God, and is never weary of telling of the love, the constancy, the mercy, and the goodness his heavenly Father to himself, the child of Prouxuriant.
