Ave. Apply H. Simpson, 82 Park Ave. and its way to the ship before a warning conting the seas. The torpedo was on its way to the ship before a warning could be given, and twenty minutes later the Alnwick Castle was going down by the head and her boats were in the water. Captain Chave and a Marconi operator were the last to leave, and they narrowly escaped the fate of the ship, which, it was noted at the time, gave a farewell noted at the time, gave a farewell blast of her whistle just before the waters closed over her. The sub-marine stood by, but presently sight-ed another vessel four miles away and set sail for her. In a short time ropodist. Suite 1, Commercial the men in the boats of the Alnwick Castle saw a great column of water on the horizon and knew that the Uboat had claimed another victim.

A Dreadful Night. In the boat with Captain Chave were eighteen of his crew, six third-class passengers and five sailors who had been rescued from the other ves-sel. The captain told the officers in the other boats to steer between east and east north-east for the Channel, and then set himself to the task of navigating his own boat. The boats were in sight all day, but in the night were separated, and saw each other no more. The sea was very rough, and a bitter wind blew the to be furled and the next day the boat was manoeuvred with oars, while the captain lashed a couple of pars together and made a sea anchor, the original sea anchor having been washed away with the rudder in the night. The whole of the day was spent in trying to keep afloat. Every moment the men in the boat were drenched with the freezing spray, and pierced by a bitter wind. Thirst now became a torment. Water was served out twice a day, a dipper
