A Love Affair

"I beg your pardon," said the ranger, looking at Fenton. "You would have liked to ride with the lady. I will give you a horse. Are you ready? Can you give my men a drink?"

"No! No matter; they can wait. Come along, then. You, Mr. Dan, go home and calm your wife. Come, sir," he added to Fenton, who shook hands with Dan as he left. "You have everything you want, I suppose?"

"Yes," said Fenton, quietly. "I am quite ready."

"Nothing in there?" asked the ranger. As he spoke one of the men went toward the door.

"Not a thing shall be touched." "There's nothing to take; we are poor," said Fenton, shrugging his shoulders. "See for yourself."

"What is all this?" "My friend was a scientific man and fond of experiments," said Fenton, carelessly.

"Oh, indeed," said the ranger from the room, and he took up one or two glasses and retorts curiously. "Science in the backwoods; that's something new!"

"He thrust it out a moment or two afterward with a pipe in his mouth, and a piece of paper screwed up in his hands. "So he is a scientific man, is he? And the lady—she is his daughter?"

"Yes," said Fenton. "The ranger knelt down beside the fire and held the screwed-up piece of paper to the flame.

"And you?" he asked. "Who are you? Her brother—husband?"

"The ranger's eyes turned upon him through the mask with a keen scrutiny. "No! But wish to be?"

"I am engaged to her," said Fenton. "I should like to be going, if you please."

"You shall," said the ranger. "Confound this paper, it won't burn! Soaked in some kind of chemical, I suppose."

"He thrust it into his pocket and took up the tongs. Fenton, who had not heard the muttered remark, buttoned his cloak around him, and looked anxiously to the door.

"Right," said the ranger. "We shall overtake the wagon in five minutes. Why is that it coming back?"

"It is in answer to the question, the door was flung open, and one of the rangers rushed in.

"Quick, guv'nor! We're tracked! The vigilants are on us; ten to one!"

"The ranger looked around. "So many as that?" he asked. "Sure!" "Sure and certain."

"The ranger tapped Fenton on the shoulder with a laugh. "I'm afraid I shall have to make for another direction than Melbourne," he said. "You be off and take care of the lady and the old man. Good-night. I'll leave you a horse."

"Fate, as it will sometimes, had played all the cards of circumstance in Rawson Fenton's favor.

He led the horse—he had even got a horse thrown in!—to a shed at the back of the hut, and then went inside. Throwing some logs on the fire, he flung himself down on the bare ground to think, and not to sleep out as he was in fatigue and excitement. His hand struck a light object, and it rolled along the floor. He thought it was one of the opals for the moment, and felt for it. But it was not one of the gems, in search of which the ranger had lost his reason; it was a ring.

Fenton held it to the blaze and looked at it. He had never seen it before. It was a man's signet ring with a strange crest—though most crests are singular—a broken lance with an eagle perched on the fracture. It was not the doctor's crest; Fenton had never seen him wear a ring; could scarcely believe in the possibility of his possessing one. Whose could it be? Had one of the bushrangers dropped it? That was the only explanation. He looked the ring neatly in the formula he had taken from Doctor Grahame's pocket, and, overcome by exhaustion, stretched himself full length and slept.

And now to England! CHAPTER III. Twelve months later a young lady stepped from the train at Berrington Station. She was alone, and dressed in plain mourning, and there was that indescribable look in her face which speaks of a heart that has been broken by a heavy sorrow, lived through yet not forgotten.

A porter came up, and after a glance at the beautiful face touched his hat and asked respectfully, though she had alighted from a third-class carriage: "Any luggage, miss?"

"A small portmanteau," replied Constance; and at the sound of her voice, so low and sweet, the man touched his cap again.

Constance looked around the station. "Can you tell me the way to Brakespear Castle?" she said.

"Well, miss, it's three miles or near," replied the porter. "You'll take a fly!" As he spoke a carriage dashed into the station yard, and almost before it had stopped the door was flung open and a little boy of seven or eight ran out, and, heedless of the footman, calling to him in respectful remembrance, ran through the gate-way onto the platform.

Constance was losing herself in girlish admiration of the beauty and grace of the little fellow, when he ran up to her, and sweeping off his cap, said: "Oh, please, are you Miss Grahame?"

"Yes, I am Miss Grahame," said Constance.

His face lighted up with a smile, and he held out a tiny hand, but drew it back and whipped off his glove. "I beg your pardon! There—I'm always forgetting. I'm so glad you have come. I've come to meet you. Grandma would have come too, but she has one of her headaches. I'm Lord Lancebrook."

eyes threatening tears; "but she must come!" "I can't help it! It isn't my fault. He told me to fetch some one, and I preferred you to Aunt Kate."

"He—who?" she asked. "I don't know. Come in here."

He opened the door of the library as he spoke, and Constance saw the tall figure of a man standing in the centre of the room.

The portrait in the picture gallery of Lord Wolfgang flashed before her mind, and she knew the man who stood before her was the long-lost Marquis of Brakespear.

"Do not be frightened," he said. "I told Arol to bring some one to me, some friend of my mother."

His tone was meant to reassure her, but it had the contrary effect. "I have frightened you, I see," he said. "Will you sit down and wait a moment?"

"Arol, do you know who I am?" he asked. "I think you are Uncle Wolfe," he said. "You are right; I am," replied the marquis.

CHAPTER V. The marquis, Constance did not know what to say, so she wisely remained silent. He looked at her for a moment, thoughtfully, then he said:

"Arol has told me your name, Miss Grahame, and I am glad he brought you instead of Lady Ruth. I have been waiting so long, and my return is so unexpected, that I was afraid mother would be alarmed if I appeared before her without preparing her. Will you be so good as to break the news of my return to her? I am sure you will do it gently."

"Yes, I will try, my lord," said Constance. "Thank you. One moment. You wonder why I did not write and tell her of my intended return, Miss Grahame? My excuse is that I did not know until a few hours ago that I was coming to Brakespear; it is an account to which then a telegram would only have alarmed her."

"I will go and speak to Lady Brakespear," said Constance. When she reached the dining room she found that the ladies had gone into the drawing room.

As she entered the drawing room she saw the marchioness seated in a chair a little part from Mrs. Norton and Lady Ruth, who was at the table, and going across the room, she approached the old lady as easily and naturally as possible.

"Where is Arol, and what did he want, Miss Grahame?" called out Lady Ruth. "He will be here presently," replied Constance; then she bent down over the old lady, and said, gently: "Arol wants you in the library, Lady Brakespear."

"The old lady got up at once. "In the library? Oh, my dear, what is the matter—has he hurt himself?" Constance drew the trembling arm within hers.

"He has not hurt himself in the least, dear Lady Brakespear. There is nothing whatever the matter; but he has a little surprise for you, that is all."

"I am always so nervous about him, he falls about so, though not so much as he did; and not so badly as my son Wolfe—he was always coming in with his head or his face out of a fall from a horse or one of the ponies. Thank God, Arol is not so wild as he was."

"And then you have not heard from Lord Wolfe—the marquis—for a long time?" said Constance, seizing upon the opening at once. "I suppose he will be sure to write and tell you when he is returning?"

"Nothing is more unlikely, my dear," she replied. "I expect when he does come back he will come quite suddenly, and without giving us any notice, just as he used to come down from London in the old times when he was a lad. I am always in a state of hope—hope deferred, and the Book says that hope deferred maketh the heart sick."

"But hope may be realized some day, dear Lady Brakespear," said Constance gently, "and you would not be too startled—it would not be too great a shock if he came quite suddenly, as you say?"

The old lady looked at her with pitiful little look in her placid, gentle eyes. "My dear, why do you ask me? Have you heard anything? Why do you look at me so kindly and pityingly?"

Constance had got her into the hall by this time, and had closed the drawing room door behind her. (To be Continued.)
