An Inglorious

The German Navy has won credit in this war. It bears the of the submarine murders, and has begun under the black flag. It has refused to fight. That interesting was disclosed by Sir Eric Geddes his speech at the historic Gull banquet. The German crews must because they were ordered out to the Grand fleet. They deprived glorious Navy of that engagement which it has so long been waiting, prevented Admiral Beatty repeating the magnificent achievements of the last great war, to the tense sorrow and disappointment of our men.

Very different was the conduct the French fleet in 1916, when it out to battle from Cadix and met Navy at Trafalgar. It suffered but it won the admiration of the by its heroism, and left a man which abides through the ages will ever be honoured in this country. So, too, with the Spanish fleet at Santiago in 1898. It steamed out to battle in an overwhelming force. It perished in battle, but a last display of chivalry, and it was glorious and worthy of the people whose flag it bore. It faithful to that call of honor the German Navy has belied.

Charming dancing frocks made of flowered silk distinctly suggest fashions of the pompadour.

Found in Snow.

As a laboring man was on his way home from work yesterday afternoon, he noticed an unusual pile of snow in the street, and deciding to investigate, discovered, to his astonishment, a man lying on the ground, unconscious or in a kind of comatose state. He was plainly under the influence of alcohol, and the discoverer found it impossible to bring life into him. Meanwhile a second man had come along and matters being explained to him, the two carried the dorman one into a nearby house. From there a doctor was called, and after examination, pronounced him suffering both from the effects of over-indulgence in alcohol and from the cold. Within a short while he had him conscious; when he told who he was and where he lived. A cab drove him home, where further medical aid was rendered. But for the fortunate happening along of the laborer the unconscious man would undoubtedly have met death, as a little longer in the snow would have proven fatal.

Cruel Treatment

A man from a nearby outport drove into town yesterday morning, and leaving the horse on George Street, went to a nearby restaurant, and stayed there for dinner. After that, he gave the horse, which was standing without a rug or other covering, a feed of oats, and callously ignoring the pile of snow on the poor beast, again entered the restaurant. Meanwhile, a woman living in a nearby house, seeing the horse standing, sent for a policeman, who ordered the owner to take the animal away, or be arrested. This was at four o'clock, and the horse was standing in the rough weather for five hours. Such conduct by the owner of a horse is most reprehensible, and he should be punished to the full extent of the law.

Some Ghost.

We were talking to a friend this morning, and the conversation turned upon ghosts. "Talk of ghosts," he said, "I'll tell you what happened to a lady acquaintance of mine last night. She was going along the street hurrying to get home, when suddenly she stopped having heard a cry, a wild, unearthly scream it seemed to her. She looked, and then turning ran from the scene, crying." Why? what the matter said a gentleman coming up. Oh, said she, a short. Nonsense, he said. Come back and show me, and together they went back. What they saw appeared at first to be something supernatural but on closer inspection turned out to be a hydrant. It was covered with snow and the appearance resembled that of a human being, as a large snowball had been placed on top of it, and a man's facial features marked in the ball. The cries heard proved to be from a cat which had covered near the hydrant, and was meowing piteously. The girl was still frightened, and when she arrived home the effects of the fright were still discernible.

Britain's Day.

The spontaneous outbursts of affection for Great Britain and the renewed evidences of cordial sympathy and understanding which have bubbled forth in the United States from the Atlantic to the Pacific since the signing of the armistice, are to find concrete expression in the observance of Britain's Day throughout the United States on Sunday, December 8th. Where the movement first started it is impossible to say. Perhaps its most interesting and gratifying feature lies in the fact that without proclamation, without any co-ordination of plan by a central authority, more than seven hundred of the leading centers of the United States are looking forward to the observance of the day with eagerness and with anticipatory enjoyment. It may be, as some suggest, that the genesis of the movement is to be found in the observance of the fourth of July in England last summer. If such is the case the Americans have "gone us one better" in kindly hospitality. In London thousands of people joined in the celebration of the birthday of liberty; in Boston, New York, San Francisco and Baltimore tens of thousands will celebrate the evolution of an idea to which a generous hearted people have given birth. Those observers who found cause for admiring comment when the strains of "My Country 'Tis of Thee" floated up the nave of the great Abbey of Westminster and the folds of Old Glory fluttered in the breeze as it was carried shoulder high through the London streets will hear tones just as strangely thrilling and see a sight not less amazing when the Union Jack is proudly carried up the aisle of a thousand churches, and "God Save the King" rings to the rafters. For the Fourth of July, and the Eighth of December reveal the true heart of the people. The misunderstandings of a century are blotted out by these new tokens of affection, and the petty annoyances of politicians and alarmists will not ring true when assayed in the scales that measure the real meaning of Britain's Day.
