A Copy-Book Case in Court. The Beatty head line copy-book is the subject of a case before Justice Ferguson at Osgoode hall. When S. G. Beatty went out of the firm of Miller & Co., W. J Gage, his partner, paid him $20,000 and supposed that he was going to keep not only the copy-books and the right to vend them, but also the name of Beatty. He accordingly registered The Beatty "head line copy-book" as a trade mark, but subsequently found that Mr. Beatty had invented more head line copy-books, and that the Canada Publishing Company were selling them with the name of Beatty attached to them Mr. Gage now brings action against the company and Mr. Beatty for damages and ssks for an injunction to restrain them from selling their books. The defendants say that the Beatty copy-books which they are selling are different from those of Mr. Gage, and also that the registration of the trade mark was effected without Mr. Beatty's consent. The case was commenced Saturday and will be continued this week. Gage, his partner, paid him $20,000 and

The ball had to be faced five or six times during the innings, one of the Shamrocks way unwinded and a foul was called but not allowed. As the play went on the cheering in the stands grew loud and long. The multitude was pretty evenly divided in their sympathies, and many who would have liked to have seen the visitors win backed the home team under the impression that victory would follow the gallant attempt made at Montreal a week ago to win the laurels from their opponents. ST. MICHAEL AND MARMION.

The Former Celebrated and the Latter Roberts was played, when the versatile powers of the former were called into requisition in combating a style which has never been practised here before, and which, we verture to say, is not first-class tennis at all. Mr. Roberts' game is wholly what is known as the base-line game, and it is now universally conceded that the only course which a base-line game was played in England, the home of tennis, for a year or more with great success. But since the introduction of the interdicted point Marmion was referred an eloquent sermon at this service, and the interdicted point Marmion was referred an eloquent sermon at this service, and the interdicted point Marmion was referred to at length. His grace warmly defended Mr. Crooks in all his statements, and regretted that some of the city papers—[the Mail and its evening reprint—R-p]—should have called the minister of education a donkey, and he (the archibabop) a donkey-rider. "Marmion," he said, "was highly immoral and very destructive to the character of young readers, and a direct insult to Catholics." In the evening, vespers and the benediction of the holy marament were held.

The Price of Bread.

The bakers are bringing trouble on their heads in keeping up the price of bread after terms. Mr. Helimuth has not had the same variety of practise, so far as we can learn, in London. Notwithstanding this difference, however, numbers of people who had witnessed the matches of Tuesday and Wednesday readily laid two to one on him for the champiouship.
