

any rate, after Gipsy went into the seminary, Don lost sight of her altogether.

And in the last place, as the preacher says, and generally to the great relief of his listeners, Don married another—a daughter of the man whose family he had been the means of saving from starvation and death—the sister of Mrs. McElwins, whose beauty, modesty, amiability all blending with an indescribable piquancy of character captured him in enduring bonds while he was at her father's house in Providence.

But here we must end, for their love for each other is another story.

THE END.
