scores against each other from previous seasons, and started in early to pay them off. The officials were lenient in the first quarter, and when later in the match they started to hand out penalties the men were too worked up to be checked by small fines. Fights featured the game, while Peter Murphy, one of the goal umpires, was assaulted by a National supporter. The spectators lost their heads also, and towards the end of the third quarter one of them took a crack at Henry Scott as he passed. Roberts and Neville essayed to go into the grand stand after him, but were pushed back. Later the police were told of the assault, but failed to get their man. The fan who attacked Murphy, however, was arrested.

For three-quarters of the match it was either team's game, the scoring being of the see-saw, even-up brand. In the last quarter, however, the Irish-Canadian home dashed in with a spurt that showed they had kept something in reserve and ran in three straight, Roberts and Fred Scott being the heroes. The Nationals came back with one.
