It is not an ancestral mansion, though it has been some five hundred years in building. The beginning of it was a sturdy sapling, standing in a tity course high on the side of an east Tennessee mountain. By and by the sapling 'ecame a big hollow tree. Not withstanding the hollow was so big a 'si' man could le stretched at length in it there was an outer shell of sound wood and plenty of vigorous leafy boughs for shade. The hollow itself was rain and store proof, to a couple of the mountain folk took up their abode in it.

They did not bother about furniture. There was no room for it, even in a hollow tree measuring seven feet across. The man put down a floor of purchenns—that is, raugh alabs split from smaller tree trunks. For a bed they had dry leaves, an i for covering skins of various salienals round about. Then they pressed their spears against his teeth to make him open his mouth, and in many other savage ways sorely tested his temper, courage and strength. At last they decided that he had dropped from the moon, and that he was not a god house.

they decided that he had dropped from the moon, and that he was not a god because his wounds bled and he needed food, but they voted him a good fellow and grew daily more and more foud of him because he was always cheerful ho wever much they annoyed him, and many of their sick soon recovered under his skilful care.

For two years Dr. Maclay lived among these savages, feeling amply repid for all his terrible sacrifices by the wealth of scientific facts he was able to collect. Money could not have tempted him to jeopardize his life and give up every civilized comfort. But the facts he gathered were needed to complete his long studies among the races of the western Pacific, and, with the ardor of the born devotee of science, he was eager to make any sacrifice that would yield him the knowledge he sought.—New York Sun.
