and many reserved in the tailor, which soldes. He got into a row with the tailor, which mided in his being put out of doors and going to a ready-made establishment. Then he took a horn of brandy to quiet his nerves, and seturned to his office again.

Sharper was there, waiting for him.

"Biter," said he, "you bought some Western Union stock yesterday. If you have no particular use for it, I will buy it of you at this morning's quotations, five per cent. advance on what you gave, as I have a customer is morning's quotations, five per cet nee on what you gave, as I have a cus to wants just that number of shares." "I won't sell," snarled Biter.
"Don't you think you will make an holding on."

Blow, only to find the confirmation of Sharper's report. He began to call them all kinds of hard names, and attempted to pull the nose of Mr. Bounce. For this he got bounced out of the office, with shoe leather accompaniments.

A couple of rogues assisted him to his feet, and paid themselves for their trouble by relieving him of his watch. He was utterly bewildered and called for the police. When the officer came he tried to tell him of his misfortunes, but Mr. Bounce cut the knot by informing the guardian that Biter was drunk, and as his appearance warranted the assertion, he was taken to the station-house to cool off.

Explanations followed, and he was finally allowed to depart. But by this time it was after business hours, and all he could do was to return home and roll the day's sweet morsels under his tongue. But the words of his wife, the way and manner in which he had left her in the morning and the domestic fragrance which he had left behind, made him recoil and wish he was under cover of the East River.

But he braced up with more nerve-settler, and reluctantly concluded to go home and fight it out with his wife.

When his mind was once made up to this, he was anxious to get there, and so went to the extreme end of the ferry-boat nearest to Brooklyn; but while standing outside of the guard-chain, the boat struck against the pier, and tumbled him into the river, from whence he was fished with some difficulty and a little less starch,

This did much to cool him off, and to convince him that he had been washing to complete the collection of the size of the burner the light can be turned down out, thus doing away with any chance the glass breaking, this alone being a great vallage. The wick requires no attention, a vallage. This did much to cool him off, and to convince him that he had been making a fool of himself all day. He went dripping into the presence of his wife, and confessed as much. She kissed him, gave him dry clothes and a warm supper, and ever since then Mr. Biter has been very careful how he gets out of bed in the morning, and never neglects to kiss his wife, and thereby escape unlucky days.
