

Sartre criticized from within his milieu

Nevertheless, for Sartre, the reason for writing cannot be justified simply on the basis that it is an inevitable human practice. Said Birchell, "If you're writing, you must justify your action. Is it a sort of passive ambition? What Sartre is trying to say is that instead of writing a novel, you could be spending time writing an anti-fascist pamphlet."

Birchell focused on two central concepts in Sartre's work. He suggested that Sartre's value of individual freedom which can be traced throughout his work, stems from the tradition of bourgeois literary values. The French Revolution and the liberal Left's strong influence in France since the beginning of the nineteenth century has absorbed French society and the French Communist Party.

"Consequently," offered Birchell, "Sartre starts within this milieu and criticizes it from within, hence the notion of individual liberty.

He also spoke about Sartre's notion of Bad Faith, or self-deception.

"To Sartre, racism is a form of bad faith. It denies one's humanity and the humanity of other human beings."

Sartre's indirect means of addressing the working class attempts to move away from the concrete and toward the abstract.

"As a result," said Birchell, "he does not resolve the problems but leaves them open to polemics."

Charter of Rights in Canada. He also feels that the methods employed by the Liberals are appropriate, although he disagrees with some of the specifics.

"We have to do in Britain what we do not have the courage or strength to do in Canada," he stated.

Canada's record on civil liberties leave a lot to be desired, according to Robinson. He cited the experience of Japanese-Canadians in World War Two, Jehovah's Witnesses' problems with Duplessis, discrimination against blacks, and the 1970 October Crisis as examples of Canada's poor record.

Robinson agreed with the Prime Minister that unanimous consent was impossible.
