A LOVE SCENE.

The princess walked down the length of the apartment. The long train of her velvet gown swept the carpet with a soft rustling sound.

As she kept her face averted it was impossible for the man who watched her anxiously to tell whether she was offended or not. By his semiromantic garb, long curling locks and a certain delicate refinement of feature he seemed to be an artist. His manner was at once earnest and deferential. Even while he watched he bent his shapely figure in an attitude indicative of deep respect.

At the farther end of the room the princess halted, but remained standing with her back still turned toward the man. Was she expecting him to speak:
"Your highness," he began, evidently interpreting her manner in that way,

"Pardon," he continued, without waiting for her reply. "If you could look into my heart, you would hear there that I am your slave-that I would die for you and yet that I hope to live for you. The gentlest zephyr that blows is not tenderer in its caress of your cheeks than my love is solicit-ous of your napiness. Bid me of your own free will to go, and I am gone,

"Go!" exclaimed the princess, pointing dramatically toward the door. "I ing dramatically toward the door. "I have heard too much, far too much.

As he rose from his knee he slightly tottered, gave the lady an intensely appealing look, then began to back himself toward the door after the conventional manner of leavafter the conventional manner of leaving the presence of royalty. The princess must have expected something further in the way of expostulation, for she looked by turns disappointed, pained, concerned and finally desperate.

The deft grace of this reply disarmed her at once. She looked at him almost tenderly, then laughed softly. "Clarence," said she, "you really must go away. No matter how you and I may feel, we must obey our fate, which inevitably drives us apart. My doom is to marry some other royal puppet whom, perhaps, I have never seen, not for love, but for reasons of state. While they were thus engaged a sound was heard, apparently in another room. The princess turned with a startled air, exclaiming:

The princess turned very pale. She clung to the artist, pushing him weakly.

"Fly, fly!" she panted. "If you love me, fly for your life"—

A portly figure in royal robes now strode into the room. The princess screamed, then collapsed gracefully. Her lover's ready arms received her fainting figure and a dramatic tableau was presented to the eyes of the aston-ished monarch, who at first glared angrily, while the artist, fairly driven to bay, regarded the royal soowl unflinch-

Overcome-Basis of the System. Overcome—Basis of the System.

"Multiplication is a vexation," particularly to tender minds, when they begin their attempt at mastering the intricate, confusing tables that present a most startling array of bewildering figures that in tall columns confront the young student. They are, indeed, particularly-vexatious, for each succeeding inflexible monument of numbers is found more difficult than the one preceding—with the relief-giving exceptions of the "fives" and "tens," which loom as inviting be-

MULTIPLYING 9x8. Efforts are too often vainly expended in these directions.

The Polish mathematician was well aware of all the difficulties that surrounded ble multiplication table, and being an observing man, he had often noticed that children used their fingers an anathematical computations which knows, and probably no one will ever know, but that our forefathers possessed it there is no doubt, for the remains of that part of the brain in which it resided are still to be seen in any one of us. These remains are simply a small and now perfectly useless little mass of brain substance called the pituitary body. It consists of two tiny little oval lobes joined together and lying in a little cavity of the skull, strangely named the sella turcica and situated

Now we must raise the value of our fingers. In the series comprising numbers of two ciphers, the thumb represents 11, the index finger 18, the middle finger 18, the ring finger 14 and the little finger 18, the ring finger 14 and the little finger 18. When multiplying one number by another the fingers representing the respective factors are placed together as before.
