Upon close inspection, however, it will be seen that while one side is plainly marked 'Napoleon Empereur,' the otherside says quite as plainly and contradictorily 'Republique Francaise.' The answer to this seeming numismatic enigma is as follows: The coins were in mint at the time of Napoleon III's accession to the Empire. One side was already stamped 'Republique Francaise,' when word came that France was no longer a republic and that Napoleon had been crowned. The obverse side was, therefore, marked with respect to the latter historical development.
