The Benefit Of Fasting.

From The Independent.

Fasting as a spiritual exercise may be of great benefit. Regarded as a mere ceremonial and practiced only in set seasons and on set days, because the church commands it, much of its real significance and value is lost. The Pharisees were scrupulously careful to observe it according to the letter of the law, but their faithfulness did not receive the commendation of Christ. It is in vain to fast often and to fast strictly, if it goes no further than the mere abstention from food. There is a fasting of the heart which is of greater efficacy than the outward observance of the minute rules which prescribe what may and what may not be eaten at the morning, midday and evening meals. Some of the Lenten regulations issued for the guidance of the faithful seem to lay too much stress upon little things. One may have fish or flesh, but not both, on Sundays; "eggs and white meats" may be taken twice a day, but not three times; dripping and lard may be used in preparing meals at which meat is not lawful; certain persons are excused from observance to the regulations altogether.

Such elaboration of rules emphasizes unavoidably the things which do not constitute fasting, nor affect the merit of fasting. It does not appear why abstinence on certain days and at certain times from flesh is more laudable than abstinence from "eggs and white meats." Everybody understands that one cannot fast absolutely for 40 days. Fasting does not mean total abstinence. The degree of abstinence must vary according to the circumstances of individual cases. The advice to abstain entirely from stimulants can be safely and advantageously followed, but throughout the year; but precise permissions and precise prohibitions are apt to obscure the spirit by laying too much stress upon the letter of fasting.

"First of all, refrain both from speaking and hearing what is untrue and cleanse thy heart from all pollution, from all revengeful feelings, and from all covetousness, and on the day of the fastest count thyself with bread, vegetables and water."
