System That Prevents Careless Engineers Running Past Signals.

New York, July 14.—How to prevent careless or sleepy engineers from running past signals is a problem that has perplexed railway managers for years, and the conclusion seems to have been reached that the only satisfactory solution is the elimination of the human factor. An automatic train-stopping device hanging from a pole besides the track has been active use on the Northern Railway of New Jersey for several years, and has been actuated more than 1,000 times by trains attempting to run past the danger signals, demonstrating its effectiveness.

From this it is agreed there appears mor reason why the plan should not be more generally adopted.

It has long been realized that, with the increasing speed and frequency of trains, and with the strain upon locomotive engineers due to the correct the human factory of trains, and with the strain upon locomotive engineers due to the correct the human and fallible and that point the human and fallible element enters, and with it the posent of the warning of signals.

In the first book ever written by a contained the picture of the wilderness. Johan Olaffson Turi, ter pastures.

When the first snow falls in the long Lapland winter Turi puts on his snowshoes and disappears. The first snow means that the wild creatures can now be tracked by their footprints, and from the beginning to the end of winter no one can find the hunter save by accident. Wrapped in his fur, he sleeps soundly and peacefully, with the wilderness around him, for although he believes that there is evil in the world, he believes that nothing can touch the harmless, the innocent.

The book that Turi has written was conceived as the only way of dispelling the ignorance about the Lapps, which, in his opinion, is the cause of the wrongs they suffer. The manager of the iron mines in Lapland heard of the book and offered to get it published. It has been translated into Danish by a friend of the author. But the book is Turi's own and is the first ever wiltten by a Lapp.
