

stitutionally legislate on a given subject, or cannot legislate to the extent that is attempted, and your friends raise up their hands in horror that so glorious a panacea has been judicially cast into the waste paper basket, tell them that it was their Forefathers who agreed to rules whereby a Liberty-loving people did not propose to have Government intermeddling with the conduct of our daily lives and our right to make a living in our own way, and that all the Supreme Court does, in such a case, is to uphold the rules.

Under our Constitutional system, there is no branch of the Government above the Constitution.

No Governmental authority may trespass upon the rights of the humblest citizen in the field of Liberty.

This noble principle was never more clearly illuminated than in Pitt's magnificent outburst of eloquence:

“The Poorest man may in his cottage bid defiance to all the forces of the Crown.

It may be frail; its roof may shake;

The wind may blow through it;

The storms may enter,

The rains may enter,

But the King of England may not enter.

All his forces dare not cross the Threshold of the ruined tenement.”
