A ninety-mile hurricane swept up along the New England coast a fortnight ago. It caught the fishing fleet of Provincetown out at sea, and nineteen fishermen of that town were drowned. Eighteen of them had children. All were poor, and the widows and orphans were left destitute some with grocery bills and rent bills due; no money with which to pay, and the breadwinner of the family gone forever.

That was the condition last Sunday morning, and then, without any prearranged planning or conferring together, the pastors of every church in Provincetown took the same subject for the morning sermon; the subject of the application of practical Christianity in such a case, which means charity and helpfulness. One preacher took as his text: "Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?" and urged that the whole Christian community toke upon itself the wilder of the subject of the application of practical Christianity in such a case, which means charity and helpfulness.
