

said, "you have eased Mr. Quill's conscience considerably; and I, too, have not been idle on Bushe's behalf. My brother practitioner very reluctantly yielded, an account of the accumulations during his guardianship,—so that our friend Amos, is at this moment, a parti by no means to be slighted by fortune hunting misses."

"Do you know his views in that way, Mr. Torrens?"

"I have a shrewd guess, my Lord."

"And what think you of his chance."

"That even without your Lordship's patronage, or this most unexpected piece of good fortune, he needed not have doubted a cordial reception, as he is a particular favorite of my old friend; and if I am not much deceived, something more than a friend of Miss Mary's. Of course, he will be none the less welcome for possessing a fortune."

"The sooner it comes off the better. My wife and her poor sister set their hearts on having Mary Dawkins for a neighbour, and I really cannot make up my mind to part with Bushe."
