T. W. Holt, engineer of St. John, was here last week looking over the site for the proposed new reservoir in connection with the water works system. He returned to St. John on Saturday and is now engaged in preparing plans, etc., which when completed will enable the town to proceed at once with the work. It is estimated that the new dam will create the storage space from one half a million gallons of water to ten or twelve millions.

On Friday last, Wilfred, the eight year old son of Mr. Henry McIntyre met with a serious and painful accident.
As he was getting out of the back of a wagon near his home he lost his balance and fell, one leg being caught in the revolving wheel and breaking it below the knee. The young lad's cry of pain quickly brought his father to the scene, and he at once saw what had happened and hastily brought medical assistance. It is fortunate the horse was not going very fast at the time, otherwise the accident would certainly have been more serious. The horse seemed to know that something had gone wrong for he immediately stopped until the boy was taken from his painful position.

Shorthand and Mental Discipline.
The mental discipline which may be derived from the practice of stenog-raphy is permanent. Speed may be lost, word signs may slip away, but the power of concentrating the attention persists. Nor is the increased power of analysis confined to the analysis of spoken words. It is brought into play in all kinds of mental work. Possibly the truth may be that only persons with minds naturally analytic can become expert stenographers and that the faculty is a cause rather than an effect of such proficiency. However that may be, the man who has a mind of that sort can select a topic at random, analyze it rapidly into its natural subdivisions and make a speech or write an essay on it while the other men would be groping around for an introduction. The value of this sort of discipline to a lawyer or preacher or writer is obvious. Mathematics is the only study that can be compared to a scientific system of shorthand for the development of analytical powers.—

A Fine Gentleman.
The Duc de Richelieu, the beloved of ladies, the breaker of hearts, was the perfect fine gentleman of a studiously elegant epoch. The suave repose of his manner was immovable. When his second wife lay dying he came in to see her, stepping softly, but in hand.
Though she was expiring, her fading eye lit up at the sight of him.

"How sweet it would be for me to die in your arms," she murmured.
He held her as she wished till she died, then went out again, stepping softly, but in hand. One of his sterner chroniclers—a woman, needless to say—suggests that he was off to a rendezvous with the lady of the moment, and that the graceful manner in which he bore the delay caused by his wife's death was proof of the perfect breeding of one of the finest gentlemen in Europe.—Geraldine Bonner in The Reader.

Paganini's Idea of the Sabbath.
An incident in the life of Paganini comes to us from Liverpool. The great violinist was visiting friends in the city of the Mersey, and he was severely strained by his guest venturing to play on the Sabbath day.

"Viv!" asked the musician, "as Sabbath was so holy that resting was to be done at all, why does Providence permit us to let birds to sing on Sat-day and see leaves of the forest to clap their hands for joy, making so rustling music, and see waters of the great deep to sound their mysterious harmonies?" Paganini's stay at that house, we are told, was brief—London News.
