A CITY DREAM.

BY MRS. FRANK PENTRILL I saw him pass: a noble youth,
With hands unstained and eyes of fruth,
With soul attuned to all great deeds,
And heart that bled at others' needs;
A young king crowned, beneath whose for
Life's flowers sprang, his steps to greet.

The forge was bright with raddy glow, Like muste fell each measured blow, As the blacksmith sang over his tell, Welding the tools whereby the soil Is fruitful made. Proudly he stood In the joy and strength of his musteed,

In the street he lies beneath the glace Of midnight gas; in rain and cold, Bespattered with mad is his gray hair, And his garments are solled and old. The thoughtless stop to joer and chaff, But others pass on with a glance of soon The kind in grief, the stern in wrath, To see old are of its honor above.
