

HELEN MOIR

LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE VOYAGE AND ITS TERMINATION.

"What are our prospects?" he asked.

"Bad; could not be worse. We are leaking, and may go down soon. You are the cause of this—see and don't ugly bodied friend there. Who could expect such an enterprise as this to thrive?"

"Bah!" returned Dubosque. "Don't be particular. What has our enterprise to do with this storm?"

"As much as Jonah had to do with the storm which overtook the ship sailing from Joppa," was the reply. "You know how that storm was laid. I've half a mind to try the same remedy."

"Don't be a fool, Rossell," said Dubosque.

"I wish you had given me that advice before I closed with your evil project; then I shouldn't have done it. It is all very well in a calm, or when to talk of superstition; but when one is at sea in a storm like this, with the water rising in the hold, it's a different matter. In two words, Dubosque, if the gale don't moderate in half an hour, the whole of us will be in eternity."

"Haven't we the boats?"

"The boats couldn't live a moment in such a sea. Well, Brayle, what effect from the pumps?"

"The water still rises slowly."

"Ah, as I feared. We may make up our minds for it. Got the prisoners on deck?"

"Why should they come on deck?" demanded Dubosque.

"Why, you wouldn't have them drowned below like rats in a hole?"

"If they are to be drowned, what signifies whether it is below or above? Their presence here would only hamper us."

"Not a bit of it. Brayle let them up. They have been brought to a pretty pass as it is; no need to make their death worse than our own."

"Seeing the captain was determined to have his way in this, Dubosque and Jaquin returned to the far corner of the deck just as Bridgemoor and Helen appeared at the top of the companion-way. They had been told the change in which the ship was, and the reason why they were brought above, but if the captain expected or feared a scene he was mistaken. The prisoners manifested perfect calmness and composure, refraining even from casting reproachful looks on those around as they went hand-in-hand to the fore-cabin, and holding up by the bulwarks, paced forth on the whif and angry sea, like some cold bosom they expected soon to be drawn.

The next report received by the captain as to the state of the ship was to the effect that the water was still slowly rising in the hold, notwithstanding the incessant exertions of the men at the pumps.

The wind had now sensibly moderated, and the straining and pitching of the vessel seemed less vehement, so that a prospect of hope might have dawned upon them had the leak not been sprung; but since all their efforts seemed unavailable to stop that, or keep the water under, they were doomed to destruction, independent of the continuance or cessation of the storm. Let the sea go down with what rapidity it might, a silent foe they could not resist was making advance on them, whose triumph was but a question of time, and of very brief time too, since the rising of the water was becoming more rapid every hour.

To make their position more cruel and hard to bear, the dark clouds parted and were scattered over the sky—patches of deep blue showed themselves, and the sun shone forth with brightest radiance, illuminating the foam-covered sea, and showing the broken line of coast a great distance away. The natural effect of the presentation of such brightness and beauty was to make life more desirable and death more bitter.

"A steamer on the stern quarter!" was suddenly shouted by a wild excited voice, and all eyes being turned towards the direction indicated, the smoke of a funnel was seen in the far distance.

Was the vessel going from or coming towards them? was now the momentous question to be determined, and, oh! what looks of breathless interest were fixed on that fiery smoke to observe whether it faded away below the horizon, or came towards them.

"She's coming! she's coming! was the joyful shout, as the volume of smoke evidently increased.

A few minutes more, and her hull and funnel rose in the water, giving full assurance that she was indeed coming towards them.

The first shipment of Canadian salt to the United States was made last week by Coleman & Gowanlock, of Seaford.

Spectacles unequalled by any for their Strengthening and Preserving Qualities.

Too much cannot be said as to their superiority over the ordinary glasses worn—there is no glimmering, wavering of the sight, dizziness, or other unpleasant sensation, but on the contrary, from the peculiar construction of the Lenses, they are soothing and pleasant, causing a feeling of relief to the wearer and producing a clear and distinct vision as in the natural and healthy sight. They are the only spectacles that preserve as well as assist the sight, and are the cheapest and the best, always lasting many years without change being necessary.
