worst he might, if he happened to take a fancy against it, make me suffer in his will."

"Umph," said the Squire, "I don't quite like the idea of a projected marriage with my daughter, Miss de la Molle of Honham Castle, being hushed up as though there were something discreditable about it, but there may be peculiar circumstances in the case that would justify me in consenting to that course. You are both old enough to know your own minds, and the match would be advantageous to you as it could be to us, for even nowadays, family, and I may even say personal appearance, still go for something where matrimony is concerned. I have reason to know that your father is a peculiar man, very peculiar. Yes, on the whole, though I don't like hole and corner affairs, I shall have no objection to the engagement not being announced for the next month or two."

"Thank you for considering me so much,' said Edward, with a sigh of relief. "Then am I to understand that you give your consent to our engagement?"

The Squire reflected for a moment. Everything seemed quite straight, and yet he suspected crookedness. His latent distrust of the man, which had not been decreased by the scene of the two nights before—for he never could bring himself to like Edward Cossey—arose in force and made him hesitate where there was no visible ground for hesitation. He had, as been said, an instinctive sight into character that was almost feminine in its intensity, and it was lifting a warning finger before him now.

"Idon't quite know what to say," he re-that that had bestower nor aneschon in another direction."

Edward's face darkened. "I thought so, too," he answered, "until yesterday when I was so happy as to be undeceived. I ought to tell you, by the way," he went on, running away from the covert falsehood in his last words as quickly as he could, "how much I regret that I was the cause of that seene with Col. Quaritch, more especially as I find that there is an explanation of the story against him. The fact is, I was foolish enough to be put out because he beat me out shooting, and also because, well I—I was jealous of him."

"I am sure," gaid the Squire, turning round to hide his natural gratification at these proposals, "your offers on the subject of settlements are of a most liberal order, and of course, so far as I am concerned, Ida will have this place, which may one day be again more valuable than it is now."

"I am glad that they meet with your approval," said Edward; "and now there is one more thing I want to ask you, Mr. de la Molle, which I hope, if you will give your cannot to the marriage, you will not raise any objection to. That is, that our engage.

Accordingly at 10:30, he arrived, and was shown into the vestibule, where he found the old gentleman standing with his back to the fire and plunged in reflection.

Also his state of health is souncertain that there is no possibility of knowing how he will take anything. Indeed he is dying; the doctors told me that he might go off any day, and that he cannot last for another three months. If the engagement is announced to him now, at the best I shall have a great deal of trouble, and at the worst he imight, if he happened to take a fancy against it, make me suffer in his will."

"I don't quite know what to say," he replied at length. "The whole affair is so sudden—and to tell the truth, I thought that Ida had bestowed her affection in an-
