CHAPTER XXVIII.

Sir Herrick is only just in time to save her; as it was, but for the intelligence of the colt, who, feeling her hand relax its hold upon the rein, stops short, she would have been under the horse's heels.

For a moment he thinks that she is dead; so white is the beautiful face, so still and lifeless the lithe girlish form. "Oh, Heaven," he murmurs, "I have killed her-killed her!"

But almost before the dreadful words have left his lips, she opens her eyes and looks up at him vacantly. "Bob," she murmurs, "it is quite true!" and the dull agony in the tone goes straight to his heart like a knife.
"Paula," he murmurs, hoarsely, as he sinks on to his knees, still holding her Paula, my darling, speak to me. It Slowly his voice reaches her, and with a piteous gesture she puts up her hand as if to push him from her.

"Don't-don't touch me!" she murmurs quickly, and with an actual shudder. "Have you not gone? Where am I? Is it—is it morning? Have I been dreaming? Ah!"-a full consciousness rushes back upon her and she remembers all-"No, I remember"-with an awful look of misery-"I remember," and as she speaks she gently but firmy puts his arm from her and rises, her hand, cold and trembling, seeking the colt who stands eying them with a grave, stolid stare. Sir Herrick stands for a moment silent as she puts her hand to her quivering lips and struggles, with heaving for mental and physical

Then he says in a low imploring "Paula, you will let me take your hand to the gate?"

She shakes her head. "No. I am—am quite well now. It it was the heat. If you will go, I will rest here for a little while" He raises his head sadly.

"I cannot go and leave you here alone and ill. Oh, Paula"—piteously— "have some mercy on me; the worst criminal, the vilest sinner—there is mercy for all;" and his voice grows in-She looks at him with an awful touching sadness in her eyes that is more hopeless than the most fiery "Have I—have I been too hard?" she says faintly. "I am sorry. Yes, I am sorry. I did not mean to be. I will ask you to forgive me," and the tears rise to her gentle eyes. "For heaven's sake, do not speak to me like that." he exclaims remorseful-"Hard! No. you have not been hard enough. No punishment could be too hard for me. I deserve all—all you can say. And yet, Paula, if you would but listen to me. I would try and show you that I have not been quite so vile as-you deem me."

—you deem me."
"Do not ask me," she says, as a big tear falls down her cheek unnoticed. "I cannot—dare not listen."
"Dare not?" he breathes, a sudden "Dare not," she repeats faintly, "if I listened I should yield. No, no, do not move, do not come near me. I should yield now and hate myself, and you, afterwards" hope rising within him.

Her head falls. 'Do you not see," she says, her eyes fixed vacantly on the trees behind, as if she were communing with herself. "that all is over? That no explanation you could offer would alter the facts—the cruel, hard facts? Even if—if you still loved me."

"Still loved you!" he echoes with bit-"If—as you say—you say—you still loved me, that the dream is broken, the vase shattered. I could never trust you again—forgive me, I do not mean say another hard word; it is you who "Go on," he says hopelessly "I would rather that you should say the bitterest words that could leave your lips, than 'As I have said, I feel that you understand," she murmurs. "I am sorry—sorry — sorry that we met. If I had "I should have come to you!"

"It would have spared both of us this -this sad parting."
"It is a mad, a cruel mad parting," he says, bitterly, fiercely. "In time-in time to come you will see this. I cannot tell you now, you will not hear me, but in the future you will under-

"In the future," she echoes, with a sad smile, "yes, perhaps, but the present is still so hard to bear. Will you go now? I-I have said that I bear you no ill-will—is not that the proper word?" and she smiles a smile more pitiful than a sob. I—I shall alway glad to hear—from others," quick that you-you are happy and prosper ous! Perhaps, in that future you—you speak of, we shall meet as—as"—bitterly-"as friends." "Never!" he says, hoarsely.

"It will be better not," she assents. "We will not meet, let us hope; and we will try and forget. The world will He breaks in with a passionate

"If you have ever had one kindly "Well, I will not," she says meekly.

"Poor girl! Yes, I can pity her, for she has been unhappy, and I—I know now what unhappiness means." Then for the last time she forgets mercy. and utters the cruelest speech she has vet vented. "Until you came I-I was He bites his lips until the blood

"Rut"-she says, repenting her-"but I shall be happy again. I am not one to wear the willow. Bob-Bob!" faltering, "always said trouble would roll off me like water off a duck's back. Let us hope that it may. And—now—for the last time, 'Good-bye,'" and she forces herself to hold out her hand.

He takes it in both his; his are hot and burning, hers as cold as ice—and strikes through her to her heart; his eves seek hers, and go to them with a passionate, humble supplication; but he knows it is hopeless; far more hopeless with that expression on her face than when it was flushed with indig-

Slowly still looking at him, she draws her hand away, and with an inarticulate groan, he turns away and slowly disappears amidst the trees. form has completely vanished, then she leans her head on her hands upon the saddle, and lets the tears flow unchecked. It is fortunate that she can cry. Some hearts have broken under the strain of such agony as overwhelms her; but for this yent, the tortured soul.

THE TIME GROWS SHORT!

OUR lease will soon expire and much of Whiskard's stock remains unsold, so the knife must go deeper. The Sale has been a great success and many thousands of well pleased buyers have been served, but it requires a lot of selling to dispose of a stock so heavy in Silks, Satins, Ribbons, Laces, Embroideries, Wools, Chiffons, Etc. Bargains fully as good as those picked up still remain, and from Dundas Street to Carling Street on both sides of the store are opportunities for saving money, such as may not occur again for years. AND A DOLLAR SAVED IS A DOLLAR GAINED. This is the place and today is the time to save both dimes and dollars.

Collegiate and City Football Teams Meet for the First Time This Season.

The Collegiate Institute and city IN LINE FOR THE SEASON The Conlegate Institute and City football teams met for the first time on the St. John's grounds last night in a land Johnnie K., owned by Mr. George McCormick. There were five starters, and Johnnie K. had to work hard for regular scheduled game in the City the honors, the field including Lady League series. The students managed Black, the promising pacer owned by game at Brockville on Oct. 1, the home team won by a score of 55 to 12, and in Gananoque last Saturday Brockville was defeated by 27 to 7.

The Waterloos held a very enthusiastic meeting last evening. It was decided to enter a team in both the city leagues, funior and senior. Consultations and senior. Consultations are considered by 27 to 7. was defeated by 27 to 7.
