much superior to other methods of lighting, in cleanliness, convenience and safety, that a discussion as to its merits is unnecessary. The only objection to it is its cost, and the necessity of residing in an area where connection may be made to an eleceric light company's lines, with its consequent dependence upon them. But by means of a new outfit, which the R. M. Millar Electric Company, 425 Richmond street, London, intends putting on the market, it will be possible of for country hotels, stores, churches, and residents of the country and outlying parts of the city, to have their own electric light plant, and to supply their neighbors also. The outfit is compact, inexpensive, easily operated, requires very little attention, and by using the new high economy lamps, will keep 50 lamps lighted of 25-candlepower each, a total of 1,250-candlepower, at a cost not exceeding two much trouble, and that the rolling cents per hour.
