Bowser Finds a Clew To the Thief Who Had Stolen the Melons

By THORNTON W. BURGESS.

Bowser the Hound followed Farmer Brown's Boy and Farmer Brown over to the melon patch. He sat down at one side and watched Farmer Brown's Boy and Farmer Brown looking for footprints. Bowser was puzzled. He didn't know what they were looking for. He knew that they were hunting for something, but what it could be he couldn't guess. Finally, he decided that he would help them hunt.

So Bowser put his nose to the ground and began to sniff about among the melon vines. He wasn't sniffing for anything in particular, but just to see if his nose would find any news. Presently he came to the place where a thief had broken open a melon and eaten it. Right away his wonderful nose picked up some news.

Bowser took a long sniff and another. He lifted his head, opened his mouth and sent his great voice roaring across the Green Meadows. Then he put his nose to the ground again and began to run this way and that among the melon vines. Every now and then he barked.

"Bowser has found something," declared Farmer Brown's Boy, and hurried over to where Bowser had barked the first time. He studied the ground carefully. He found a footprint. It was very faint, but there was no doubt that it was a footprint.

The guests were welcomed by Miss Margaret Leach and Miss Phyllis Shambleson, while Mrs. W. Sherwood Fox and Mrs. H. R. Kingston presided over the tea table. A jolly modeling game in which too-picks and gum played an important part, was held. Cards, too, formed part of the entertainment. A clever reading was given by Miss Helen Clark.

"Bowser has found something," declared Farmer Brown's Boy.

He hadn't seen it before because he hadn't been looking for that kind of a footprint. There was nothing human about this footprint. It was very much such a footprint as a dog might make. The first thought of Farmer Brown's Boy was that the one or ones who had stolen the melons had had a dog with them.

But Bowser the Hound knew better. It wasn't the scent of another dog that his wonderful nose picked up. In a moment or two his master understood this, for Bowser wouldn't have barked in the way he did if he had found the track of another dog. He might have growled a little, but he wouldn't have sent that great voice of his rolling across the Green Meadows as he was now doing. Barking like that is called baying and Bowser bays only when he is following the trail of someone he delights to hunt.

Meanwhile Farmer Brown had been looking at some of the pieces of melon rind. "Son," said he, and on his face was a puzzled look, "this melon wasn't broken open by hands. Teeth did it. Come, look at this!"

Farmer Brown's Boy looked. On that melon rind the marks of teeth could be plainly seen, and those teeth were not the teeth of a boy or a man. Bowser came over and sniffed at the melon rind. He whined with eagerness and kept sniffing and sniffing. Then Farmer Brown's Boy saw another of those footprints. He pointed it out to Farmer Brown. "Old Man Coyote has been here," said Farmer Brown's Boy.

Then such a funny expression as the faces of those two wore. The same thought had come to Farmer Brown's Boy and Farmer Brown at the same instant. Could it be that Old Man Coyote was the melon thief? Could it be that Bowser the Hound had found a clew to the thief who had stolen their melons?
