

iaries and members of Programme Committee. It is full of good common sense, hints as to the time and place of meeting, and the preparation, arrangement, etc., of the programme ; also, what is of equal importance, the proper conduct of the meeting by the presiding officer. If all these suggestions were carried out, they could not fail to increase the attendance at the monthly meetings, and give a deeper interest in the work to many who are indifferent and careless with respect to it. The First Hundred Years of Modern Missions.—We have in this book a valuable contribution to our missionary literature, and it will be gladly welcomed by those desiring a general knowledge of the missionary work done during the past century, and whose time and opportunities for reading are comparatively limited. There is in this pamphlet of forty-eight pages an excellent epitome of the work, beginning with the state and condition of the churches before the time of Wesley ; and giving from the work of Carey in 1792 all the principal missionary items during the century. It consists of a series of short articles on missions in America, the Pacific Islands, Africa and Asia, and gives a general idea of the geography, customs, climate, language, etc., of the parts most unknown to us ; also the state (past and present) and progress of the people, closing each article with a summary of the work done. The pages on "A Century of Modern Mission Chronology" will be found invaluable to one requiring a date for any prominent missionary event. Short biographies of missionaries, containing thrilling and inspiring facts concerning their conflicts, trials, persecutions and conquests, make this little book most interesting. The articles on "Heathenism versus Christianity," "Proportion of Missionaries to Population," "Missions and Wealth," "Missions versus other Expenditures," "Missions as a Business Investment," etc., are very suggestive, and might convert the most sceptical to the possibility of evangelizing the heathen, and prove that in a temporal or worldly sense it pays to invest in missions. We close the book, impressed with the magnitude of the work already accomplished, and appalled at the view of what is yet to be done, at the same time feeling that What God hath wrought in the past, He is able still to perform.
