FIRE OVER WHITE FLAG.

Despicable German Treachery in East Africa Exposed by Admiralty.

A story of German white flag treachery in East Africa in the early days of the war is issued by the British Admiralty.

In order to prevent the German merchant ships lying in the harbor of Dar-es-Salaam from coming out and acting as tenders to the raider Koenigsberg, two of his Majesty's ships were dispatched to that harbor. The German Governor had agreed that the German merchant ships must be regarded as British prizes, and he was now informed that their engines must be disabled. An hour later the Germans hoisted a couple of white flags on the flagstaff at the harbor entrance, whereupon working parties in boats were sent from the warships to inspect and, if necessary, dismantle the engines.

No sign was made from the shore until the boats were well within range, when a treacherous fire was opened on them, the German white flag still flying. The senior naval officer, who was in one of the boats, has reported his experience as follows:

"I had just given orders to go ahead, when we were suddenly assailed by rifle fire from both banks, a considerable volume coming from the shore. The senior naval officer, whose ship was in the lead, whence still flew three white flags. Steering was difficult, speed slackened, and it was found that the steerer forward was lying in the fore-peak dangerously wounded.

"Bullets were raining over and into the boat, and through and against the iron plates rigged on either side the boiler, and round the coxswain in the stern sheets, but Lieut. Corson, with great pluck, ran forward and kept the fires going. Very soon after a seaman was hit in the head and collapsed, and then the coxswain, with blood running from his mouth, was shot in the leg. His conduct was splendid. He never flinched but stuck to his post, saying: 'That's nothing, sir; I'm all right. We shall soon be out of the channel.' It was very largely due to the coolness and pluck of this leading seaman that the boat safely emerged from the danger zone."
