Shora of irrelevancies and spite, his story was this:

"Lis business took him close to Smugglers' Hole on a certain night, or perhaps he was only passing it, any way when he saw a man dressed in a pilot coat, outside clothes he should describe as 'fancy,' dodging about outside the house, making dodging about outside the house, making as if he were in doubt whether to go in or not; he stopped to see what it all meant, and presently the man lifted the latch and went in, shutting the door behind him. Asked if he peeped, Jake boldly admitted that he did, but couldn't see so much as her shee-string, the blinds were down, but he could reade out the did, the see the seed of the seed o e could make out the glint of a fire brough it, and catch the sound of voices. through it, and catch the sound of voices. His wife had always said that Judith would be caught on of these days, and only behaved herself because folks were looking, and at the time he didn't think the man was up to any good there, after dark, and with such queer rags. He hadn't seen his face, and didn't think of Seth Treloar. Didn't stay at the window long for fear Steve Croft should come back and catch him there, but thought he'd stop and see the game out. Sat down by stop and see the game out. Sat down by the cliff, a bit of a way off—may be a hundred yards, and stayed there till Steve came home.
