THE POET PHILOSOPHER.

Your friends will come to your humble cot, and sit on the porch with you and talk of the tariff until they're hot, and help you to smoke and chew But when you are needing a helping hand to carry a trunk up-TRIENDS stairs, your friends will scatter to beat the band, each bent on his own affairs. Your neighbours will lean on the backyard fence, and help you to roast the law, and shoot fiery arrows of eloquence at effigies made of straw. Your friends are thoughtful and kindly men, the sait of this blooming land; but when you are trying to catch a hen, there's no one fo lend a hand. Your riends will help you to dance and sing, and eat up your cake and ple, and they'll give advice and perhaps they'll bring some flowers to you when you die. That man would cherish and love his friends the law of this life demands; but he who wins in this world depends alone on his own two hands.

n Tenderest Sympathy for the Irreparable Loss of Their Lovely Daughter, Mary.

[The circumstances of her dying in distant land, her letters arriving when the hand that penned them was rigid in death, and the fond hopes of hose who looked forward to her ome-coming, enhance the mournful interest with which the news of her death has been received.]

Dark ship that cometh Whence our child receded Thro' those grand portals* Lov'd by her so well! o some thou bringest joy! Dear ones returning-To me thy 'boom" is like o futile are the dreams We dream! Dear Heaven Dids't need our child

A funeral knell!

Some angel band to fill! This is the thought that buoys Our weary spirit And whispers to our Aching hearts, "Be still"!

How shall I look upon The cottage garden. Whose flowerets droop'd Ee'n as'she said "good-bye"

They'll bloom again, But not for you, my Mary You dreamless sleep
