There is no desire for blood manifested in this proceeding. It is true that the King and Queen fled, and, it may be said, escaped, but from what fear and danger we do not learn. Of course there is a vast difference between him and the members of his family on such occasions. His life, or the possession of his person, might be an object with Revolutionists. We shall, no doubt, have these particulars explained [Ex- Chamber of Peers is rather significant.] by the next mail. But one cannot but feel for the Paris this morning is perfectly quiet, but the reverses of this great man and his amiable wife, shops are closed and the streets are barricaded both aged as they are, wandering fugitives from This proclamation produced a temporary calm, as before. The people crowd the streets, and farm to farm, and at last to betake them to an open but the unfortunate occurrence at the Foreign are preparing to go to attack the Castle of boat, and thus find a landing on the English coast at Brighton. Here history exceeds roman. e. What a picture of the vicissitudes of human life! The man that might have lived in every possible degree of human happiness, in the hearts of his people. and who after death might have made their hearts his most honoured grave-flees for life and liberty, is forgotten in a moment, and politically dies an ignominious death. He strained the bow of political power, till it broke in his hands. Louis Philippe is once more a private individual in London-that celebrated city of refuge for all nations.

With regard to Europe, the influence of the French Revolution of 1848 is tremendous. As was hinted in our last number, there is a heavy debt to the Reformers of Europe. There is Austria, Prussia, and Russia, still ruling with despotic authority over their people; they are sustained by large standing armies; and there is Poland, stunned but not dead. and by the treaty-breaking powers of Europe doomed to extinction. We have no doubt of her resuscitation. All these despots are trembling; and let it only be known, and fully understood, that the power resides in the people, both actually and legally, they will use it throughout Europe.

In England the power of the people has been recognized, and the Throne is based upon it; consequently, there is no danger, as we have intimated

With regard to the effect of the French Revolution on Europe generally, there is little occasion to add any remarks to the contents of our Extra, except to notice that there are strong indications that, the whole movement will be a peaceful one, whatever disturbance the internal affairs of the individual nations may take place. The prompt recognition of the new Government of France by the Ambassadors of the United States, England, Belgium, and Switzerland, is a guarantee of the peace of Europe, so far as those nations, in that recognition, recognise the policy of non-interference of one nation in the internal affairs of another.
