Her Recompense.

His sister resembled him very much in face and feature, although her manner was less awkward, and there was an in-telligent expression in her mild gray eyes that was lacking in his. Her figure was very prim and extremely

Her figure was very prim and extremely heat in her steel-gray traveling suit, which was cut in the fashion of twenty years previous; a bonnet whose shape must have borne the same date, and a mantle trimmed with that old builion fringe such as our grandmothers used to wear. She also wore a spotless kerchief about her Lock, pinned with a huge brooch with a great yellow stone, and black mitts without any fingers.

She wore her side hair in corkscrew curls, so small and flexible that they reminded one of alder tassels constantly waying in the wind; but she had, withal, a pleasant face, a genial smile and the kindest eyes in the world.

She was proverbially industrious, being constantly employed upon a blue woolen stocking, through which she made her bright steel needles click and fly as if her entire support depended upon her occupation.

chance acquaintance; while "Marthy Ann" was his hobby, and, according to his honest belief, the most wonderful woman the earth possessed.

"She an't so genteel, p'rhaps, as she might be," he remarked upon one occasion, but bending an affectionate glance upon the prim spinster, who was apparently oblivious to everything save her knitting, "nor so sweet and purty to look at as some of them young blossoms over yonder, with a half wondering, wholly delighted glance at Miss Grace Campbell, who was the acknowledged beauty of the whole company—"she never was; but," impressively, "she's good through and through. There an't nothing she don't know about sickness, and yarbs, and medicines, and nothing she wouldn't do for anybody that was sick. She's a great medicines, and nothing she wouldn't do for anybody that was sick. dainties for sick folks, and work till she's ready to drop for anybody in a tight place. I tell you, sir, when Marthy Ann dies the world'll lose a stunner."

"Have you and your sister always lived together?" he was asked, after one of these dissertations.

"Yes, When the old folks died we was all there was left, and it seemed kind o' natural for us to hang together. It's been a capital thing for me, and we've had quite a comfortable kind of a life. But it's been a pretty quiet one, and so we thought, as long as we could as well as not, we'd start out on a little tower for a change, and we mean to see considerable of the world before we die."

As may be supposed, this original couple, created no small 'amount of merrismall amount of merriment among the more worldly wise people into whose society they were thus

Miss Grace Campbell, who was a merry and thoughtless sprite, with two or three of her young friends, could not always be restrained, and they bubbled over with fun and jest at the quaint manners and sayings of their "down east" companions. One morning they were all assembled upon the deck of the steamer, and in a wonderfully merry mood.
Their arrows were flying thick and fast among themselves, when Miss Starkey came up from the saloon, knitting in hand, and immediately became a target for them to shoot at. She seated herself near the joyous group a quiet smile on her lips, a look of enjoyment in her mild eyes, as if the sight of such pretty young faces was a great pleasure to her.

"Now, we'll have such fun!" whispered

"Now, we'll have such fun!" whispered impulsive Grace Campbell. "Til quiz her unmercifully about those endless stockings, and it'll be as good as a play."

But Grace's efforts to create a laugh at the expense of the old maid only resulted in her own discomfiture. Every remark, which was intended to be so mirth-inspiring, was adroitly turned against the amazed girl, who soon retired from the field, abashed and regretful. The old maid, in a few well-chosen words, had administered a lesson which caused Grace to resolve that she would not again drace to ridicule a person older than attempt to ridicule a person older than herself.

Half an hour passed, and Grace again made her appearance before Miss Starley, with the grave face of a penitent. She made a sincere apology, and was as to ridicule a person older than "You were a trifle thoughtless, perhaps," said the old maid, "and Marthy Starkev never lays any ill-will against anybody; least of all against a pretty little innocent like you."

She put up her hand and patted Grace softly on the shoulder as she make She put up her hand and patted Graco softly on the shoulder as she snoke.

"Thank you, Miss Starkey," Grace returned, the shadows all gone from her lovely face now that the ordeal was so comfortably over: "and will you let me give you this?—it's a little silk burse that I crotcheted for mamma's birthday; but I can easily make another before that comes, and I would like you to have it. Not because," she added, hastily, and coloring, "I think it will make up for anything, but because I shall feel that you are really friendly with me if you will take and use it," and she put a lovely little seal-brown purse with silver clasps into Miss Starkey's hands as she ceased speaking.
The woman's lips quivered. It was seldom that anyone had given her a keep-sake during her monotonous life; and this pretty little trifle, tendered so mod-estly by the beautiful girl, touched her to the heart.

"Of course I'll take it, dear, and thank you kindly too," she said, in a tone that was not exactly steady, "and—and I'll send you a pair of nice mittens, as soon as ever I can knit them."
CHAPTER XIV.

"Will you, truly?" Grace questioned, eagerly. "If you will, I promise to wear them when I so sleigh-riding, and I know. they will be just as comfortable as can shrewd smile hovered about the old maid's thin lips, and, bobbing her cork-screw curls back and forth, she said in have them."

And let us add just here that before the first snow fell, there came to her Fifth avenue home a little box directed to Miss Grace Campbell, and postmarked "Starkeyville, Me."

"My mittens." she cried, with the merriest laugh in the world, as soon as her glance fell upon that postmark, while she expected, upon opening the box, to find a pair of coarse, clumsy ones like the stockings which she had seen the

But what was her astonishment to find instead a dainty pair made of the love-liest shade of blue silk, beautifully fine and even, such as only experienced fingers like Miss Starkey's could fashion. like Miss Starkey's could fashion.

"I tell you mamma, there is more in that queer old maid than any of us imagined," said the delighted girl; "and I am going to write her a letter and tell her how pleased I am."

Rich, who had won her favor by his manly conduct, also received a pair of fine woolen hose, which he put away with his fishing-suir, to be ready for trouting the next summer.

About Christmas two boxes, containing some pretty reminders of the season, went flying-over the rails to Starkevville, to gladden the hearts of the quaint sister and brother, who scarcely knew what

Then, after a six weeks' trib to Cali-fornia and the Yosemite with a tutor and two or three classmates, he returned to New York intending to spend a year abroad with Miss Waldemar before set-tling down to the real business of his life.

But here came a crash in the financial affairs of the country about that time, which disarranged these plans, and which was to prove of what kind of stuff Richwas to brove of what kind of shift Richmond Waldemar was made, and to give him a chance to see what he could do for himself and the fair, sweet woman whom he loved as well as he could have loved his own mother.

Gammage's Beautiful Flowers. The horticultural building owes most of its attractiveness to the beautiful exhibit of J. Gammage & Sons, which is, as usual, the handsomest and most prominent in the building, and one of the most beautiful in the whole exhibition, with its extensive and magnificent display of cut flowers, palms, flowering plants and made-up designs. Gammage & Sons have undoubtedly one of the largest floral trades in Ontario. Nordheimer's Pianos Excel Every day brings fresh testimony to the fact that the Nordheimer piano is undoubtedly the best instrument on exhibition at the fair. Only two of the magnificent pianos they have in their exhibit are left unsold, and it is more than likely that these also will be sold before the fair is over. The Nordheimer piano embodies tone of peculiar vocal quality that easily voices every shade of motion and expression, while the powerful yet sympathetic quality of expression which it possesses has made it a great' favorite with musicians everywhere.

The action and general construction are of the best. But it is not alone in tonal beauty that the Nordheimer piano excels, but also in the artistic lines of its casework. It is an especially suitable piano for a drawing-room, because it is constructed always of the most beautiful, highly polished woods, of excellent design and finish. It is a piano which cannor fail to grace any drawing-room and will prove a lifelong source of pleasure and entertainment The exhibit at the fair is in charge of Mr. James J. Callaghan, general manager, and an efficient staff, who esteem it a pleasure to answer questions concerning their piano.
