the roar of its wheels sounded frightfully close behind him.

It was too close now to be stopped, for the curves and the bushes had hidden him from she engineer's view. There was plenty of time for Tom to jump off and save himself, but that was not what he was thinking of that would mean either a train thrown from the track, or the sacrifice of the little boy before him. Tom Bruce had not come so far on such an errand as either of these.

Forward! There should be a race for it Just ahead was the little station of Argyle; the twas the meeting place of these two trains.

The young man thought over the "advice" and, after quite a little struggle with himself, he decided to do the best and most he knew how, whether he received any more pay from the company or not.

At the end of the year the company raised his wages and advanced him to a more responsible position. In three years he was getting a third more salary than when he begun, and in five years he was head clerk of the department; and the man who had condescended to give the green-horn advice was working under him at the same figure that represented his salary eleven years be-The one going south ran upon the side that represented his salary eleven years be-and fortunately the little fellow understood and obeyed. The two hand cars came together with startling force; then they both moved on with gathering speed toward the open switch.

The switch was passed, and the two carsentered upon the side track just before the express that belonged there.

The succession of the past hand a correct the succession of the succe and obeyed. The two hand cars came toexpress that belonged there.

The last car of the north bound express was just passing the other end of the siding. All was clear in advance, so Tom, without losing a stroke of the levers on his own car, pushed the car before him, with its helpless little passenger, out upon the main track below the station.
