There they argued for a world wide and everlasting peace and formulated a general plan for the pacific solution of all international problems. But since then there has been a decided outbreak of warlike epirit, and it is evident that in the school of strategy and diplomacy the peace lessons will not be readily learned. Still the representatives of the nations may Still the representatives of the hattons may by prolonged efforts teach their people to mould their swords into plow shares. A single failure does not brand the project as futile, though there is reason to doubt the wisdom of some teachings of even so repres-entative a body. At Paris a few days ago the Congress argued to make international arbitration obligatory. In the interests of peace, such a policy would surely be disas-trous; more apt to produce war than promote diplomation of military force; that they hould go into China at their own rinks and perils; that Europe should abandon any religious protectorate in China; that forcible anceration of territory, especially that held in the Portes as a control of the meet the enders for the control.
