

thought is truly a stirring one, and sublime. As we meet, from time to time, around our communion table, we may remember those brethren at Antioch whose words we have cited, and all those whom they remembered. We may feel ourselves one with them in faith, hope, and spirit;—members of the great body of Christ, perpetuated throughout the ages;—linked by a living family tie to all holy souls in heaven and earth. Surely this is a thought from which we ought to draw strength and inspiration so to fulfil our part here, and now, that when we are removed hence, we may not find ourselves aliens and strangers, but sanctified to enter, and fitted to enjoy, the eternal home of the blessed.
