The second epoch is introduced by an old-time charivari for a wedding party, and, as a fair maid remarked, it was astonishing that anybody got married under the circumstances. From an historical point of view as bearing upon Ontario this epoch was best of all. After seeing this series of stir-ring events no one ought ever to be able to corner you on the history of the war of 1812 again. James Second comes in first, and the whole story of the bearer of the tidings which gave victory to Canada at Lundy's Lane, is explicitly told. Peter Gage had previously shown her the way to engineer a surprise, and this bit of his-tory is also etched into the memory tory is also etched into the memory by the pageant picture. That is the story of Stony Creek. Then follows Tecumseh and the battle of the Thames, during which two Toronto aldermen in the audience forgot that they were not living a hundred years ago, or else imagined that they were in council for the moment.

No public question has hitherto aroused a tithe of the interest which attaches to this, and the larger matter of annexation. At a late hour yesterday, Mayor Brown had however received no official notification as to the hour of meeting.

His worship, yesterday to The World, discussed the matter frankly, and discussed the matter frankly, and while not favoring an early submission of the annexation question, and regret-ting the defeat of the Stibbard by-law, said, among other things: "So far as I am concerned, I am determined that no big expenditure shall be made in the town in future, without first coming in touch with the city, and acting in conformity with their plans.
