The receipt, and thrust the notes into a pooket-book. The farmer had paid him the same notes he had himself received from some transactions in cattle. The pocket-book was put back again into the breast pocket of his cost.

Courtenay had no earthly intention of hetting when he started, and was, indeed, as he considered, saved from the suggestion of temptation by having no money to speculate with. But the air of Newmarket is heavy with the instinct of bookmaking. The train was of course full of people, whose one thought was the horses, the jockeys and the odds. Outside the station Liloyd met a casual acquaintance, whom he was glad to join for mere companionship sake, in the bustling and not over-polite crowd. Mr. Auderson had the day's racing at his finger ends, and soon Liloyd likewise was armed with a card or "c'rect card of the day's racing," to give its full local dignity of nomenclature. Unfortunately, tôo, Mr. Anderson knew exactly what was going to win the principal race of the day; always a dangerous piece of information to possess, as more often than not special information before a race is apt to be very expensive afterwards. He also had his ideas about the first fixture, in which only five horses had accepted, and four the first fixture, in which only five horses had accepted, and four received before the agent's return, as he received before the agent's his ideas about the first fixture, in which only five horses had accepted, and four received before the agent's return, as the evidently appeared on the board. left by the night train after the bailff (Diamond" Prepared Paint, Courtenay took no part; but he stood by had arrived. when his friend handed in his ten-pound

The banker waved screw Courtenay's courage to the sticking him back.

Out of the pocket-book came five-and-disposed to consider whether you lost the twenty pounds, which were duly placed which eat this rascally meeting to which you in the bookmaker's hands. The suspense was breathless. At last The words seemed to stick in poor Lloyd's "They are off!" rings from a thousand throat. All the memory of his past life throats. Here they come. What a noble came up before him. It has been a pleasant stretch of turf it is! Now they are open, careless existence. Then it had won-breasting the hill. "Karkoss wins— derfully deepened with his love to Vivyan; Karkoss wins in a canter!" What a and although they were poor, hope was Karkoss wins in a canter!" What a shout there is. The friends take it up, although they cannot distinguish the horses one bit. Still Karkoss ought to win. At last they see "yellow and black" stripes opposite to them, apparently far in advance of his field. At this moment there is another cry, just as loud but not so jubilant as the other: "White Heart walks in—White Heart wins in a canter!"

He turned his other pocket out, in a vain hope that in-advertently some other receptacle conadvertently some other receptacle contained the missing property. Everything she was safe, even to his watch; but no pocket-book rewarded the diligent assach. No doubt the thief had seen the notes when the agent took the others out, had watched his opportunity, and stolen the notes during the press at the station.

"DEAR MISS MELCOME,—
