Love Finds the Way

"There, you shall have the best. Papa, rap at the window when you want some more coffee. I am making up a bouuqet for Lady Besant"—and, with a word of addeu, she flitted through the window again.

Sir Ralph looked after her lovingly, and Mr. Resant's eves followed, too.

and Mr. Besant's eyes followed, too.

"Lilian is looking well," said Sir Ralph,
"better than she has for the last day or two."

"Yes," said Mr. Besant, "ye-es. By the way, Sir Ralph," he continued, plucking up courage and clearing his throat, "we talked of a toot together for some days. What do you say to a gallop over the common this morning? I—I—have something to say to you—that is,, to—ahem!—ask you—"

Sir Ralph looked up from his newspaper.

Mr. Besant consented with prompt eagerness, and the two galloped back across the common to meet the cavalcade in pursuit of them. paper.
"Certainly, my dear Harry; we will start after breakfast."

"Gertanny, my uses, start after breakfast," "All right, thank you," said Mr. Besant. "I think I'll go and see the cattle. You will ride the cob, I suppose?" "Yes," said Sir Ralph. "I will come down to the stables after you!" And Mr. Besant thundered through the window, snatching up his cap and whin as he walked. But she stopped suddenly as she caught the sad look on his face.

Lord Harcourt saw it, too, and knew at once that the master of the Towers had been suing for the heiress of Riversshell's hard the window, snatching up his cap and whip as he walked.

Sir Ralph looked after him uneasily, and then his eyes strayed to Lilian with a painful anxiety in them.

Could it be that the blow he had dreaded for months was now going to fall? Was this young man going to ask him what he valued more than life itself his daughter, his pearl—Lilian?

Smothering the pain at his heart, the old man sacrificed his second cup of coffee rather than meet his daughter's eye, which he knew would pierce and detect his sadness at a glance, and, taking his hat and whip, walked round to the shall's hand.

Cutting in hastily, with his usual presence of mind, he said:

"You are just in time to decide upon an argument, Sir Ralph. Miss Dalton his pitted her pretty litle roan against my good old hunter. You shall decide which is the better of the two."

"No: a race," said Claude Ainsley.

"Sir Ralph is not an impartial judge. His gallantry would compel him to give the palm to the lady's."

"Well, so be it. What do you say. t his sadness at a glance, and, taking hat and whip, walked round to the

"No, no," said Mr. Besant. "I—you will remember."

"Oh, yes; oh, yes; I remember," said Sir Ralph. "You wanted to ask me some-thing. Saunders, tell the ladies, if they ask, that we have gone across the com-mon."

mon."
So the two started, both uneasy, but from very different causes.
Mr. Besant found it difficult to commence, and, as a prelude, thought it wise to indulge in a little small salk.
He pointed out, not for the first time, the various improvements he had made, and intended to make, on the estate—improvements which Sir Ralph applauded.

ed.
"Yes," he said, "the Towers has very much improved. Harry, you have done your duty to the estate."
"And will do it, Sir Ralph, still," said Mr. Besant, plunging into his subject. "I don't intend to stop, sir, if all goes well."

Yes," said Sir Ralph, uneasily

"Yes," said Sir Ralph, uneasily,
"Yes," repeated Mr. Besant, "there is plenty of room for further improvements, enlargement, and all the rest of it, and I am eager and anxious to get it done.

"I—I would rather not, Harry," said Sir Ralph, gravely.

"Rivershall and the Towers have been fast friends for a great many years," continued Mr. Besant, cunningly touching on Sir Ralph's weak point. "I would ask you, Sir Ralph, to consent to my binding them still closes. You must be aware of my feelings to Miss Melville. I have been devoted to Lil—I mean Miss Melville—ever since I can remember anything at all, and you must know that the dearest wish I have is that she may become my wile."

Sir Ralph trembled and turned pale; he almost groaned into the bargain.

"Harry, forgive me if I say I feered what was coming. No, do not look so distressed; I have no objection to urge against your suit; but if an angel from heaven came to ask me for my darling I should still feel grieved. She is all the world to me, Harry."

Mr. Besant's courage rose.

"Don't take it to heart so, sir," he said. "I shan't take her far, only this fence divides Rivershall and the Tow-round, so sharply that Liban's felt it self affronted, and, pricking up its ears, rose on its bind legs.

"Take" care, Lilian!" cried Sir Ralph.

Mr. Besant said nothing, but very unwisely made a dash for the spot.

The excited horse took fright at such a sudden onslaught, and, laying backher ears, put all four feet to the ground and set off at a swinging pace.
"Merciful heavens!" cried Sir Ralph; this beast has run away!"

Mr. Besant was for dashing after it, but Lord Harcourt rode in front of him and Sir Ralph, and, holding up his hand, exclaimed: ers."

Sir Ralph started.

There was something too much of assurance in the words and manner.

"You do not understand; I cannot expect you should," he said, in a low voice.
"It is not the distance, Harry, butwell, well, let me say no more of myself. But you have not spoken to Lilian?" ough a you not make that were by cluttering after. See, she has turned him already. "Not a word. Oh, no, not until I had gained your permission to do so," said Mr. Besant, with the air of one who had nothing to fear from that quarter. "No, Sir Halph, I told my mother—she is very fond of Lilian, and will be a second mother to her—that I would speak to you first."

Sir Rilph sighed.

"I have no grounds for withholding my consent, Harry," he said, trying to speak cheerfully. "If you can win her, take her. She has been all that a daughter can be; she will be—I say it Harry, with perfect assurance—a true and devoted wife!"

Mr. Besant, as much as his rough na-

Thook, papa," and before cayone could prevent her she had spruky into the saidle, "it is quiet enough now. Let me ride him again, do!"—and she started at a canter, the gentlemen forming guard at either side, and Mr. Besant urging Lilian to exchange with him at every sten.

"And all the world besides." The lover, having got over his un-easiness now that he had gained the fa-ther's good word, grew cheerful, not to say hilarious, and Sir Ralph, finding his companion's spirits rather in discord with his own heavy heart, proposed that they should turn homewards, saying, as an excuse, that he had some letters to

There was a ring in his voice which she had never heard before, and her gentle eyes sought his face in surprise.

"Yes," she said, quietly, "I am."

"I would not if I were you," he said.
"You will get thrown."

There was so well-defined a tone of possession in the reply that all detected it and understood it save Lilian herself.

The look of surprise deepened, but she made no reply, and steered her horse into the line which the others were al-

"The common is fearfully uneven," he said, "full of holes and inequalities. You will be thrown, I am sure."
"No." said Miss Dalton, who would have risked her neck for the honor of nacing with Lord Harcourt. "Lor Harcourt has piqued me, and I will put it to the test."

"No," replied Mr. Besant, suskenly.
"But I think it an uncommon foolisithing for ladies to be racing off in that madcap fashion."

And he watched Lilian as she, rattling ahead of them all, turned to wave her hand with a smile at Claude Amsley, who was pushing on behind.
Sir Ralph said nothing, but watched the race in silence.
Lilian kept the lead for a half turn round, and then Lord Harcourt swung in first, keeping there till the goal was reached, with Miss Dalton second and Lilian third.

Toronto, July 15 .- The High Courts are to be appealed to upon the question as to whether or not ice cream is a food Gibbons said: "Divorces are multiplied because of the loose legislation on matrimony which renders it easy for married parties to annul the marriage bond. If the civil laws of all our States were as strict as they are in Canada, the persons contemplating marriage would seriously and prayerfully reflect; they would study each other's disposition and temperament before engaging in a contract which would bind them for life. And certainly the peace and good order in the family life in Canada can be favorably compared with the domestic conditions existing in those States where divorce can be easily obtained."

Harry, with perfect assurance—a true and devoted wife!"

Mr. Besant, as much as his rough nature would let him be, was touched.
"I am very grateful, sir," he said; "and I know how great a treasure you are confiding to my care. I will guard it with my life."

Sir Ralph inclined his head.
"You will speak to Lilian," he said; "but remember I do not bias her; she is free to choose or decline. I love her too well to influence her by a single word or look."

"All right, sir," said Mr. Besant, cheerfully. "I am no coxcomb, but I am not afraid. We have known each other is long while, and I do not think Jalian has lost her heart to another."
"No," said Sir Ralph, with quiet dignity, "or I should know it."

"Just so," said Mr. Besant; "just so," said Mr. Besant; "just so," said Mr. Besant; "just "Just so," said Mr. Besant; "just so," said Mr. Besant; "just so," said Mr. Besant; "just "Just so," said Mr. Besant; "just so," said Mr. Besant; "just so," said Mr. Besant; "just "Just so," said Just said said said said said sai
