And the last word died away in the dismistress. Mr. Ned Simpson whistled tance, and prettie Hattie Winters blushed again, and became still more jamilia up to the tips of her pretty ears, and chucking her under the chin, and doing when at a safe distance peeped over her many other things that flattic didn't pretty shoulders for another glimpse at exactly like-indeed, behaving in such a the two rather handsome but exceeding manner that the pretty dairy maid very foppish young men who had passed her, shortly beat a hasty retreat, leaving her following quick with the remarks we have gay cavalier to wend his way homeware at his own will, which he soon did, with

It isn't greatly wondered at that Hattie eyes bent on the ground, and muttering scudded over the next half mile of her rather sarcastically to himself,course with wonderful celerity, and diving "Pooh! only a dairy maid after all! By through the farm house door into the Jove! by our inquries we funcied we had entry, almost stumbled over good Mrs. found a mare's nest, and that this pretty bit of fer ininity was the rich old Squire dressed in capo'-pie order for visiting, and Ainsworth's daughter. But Hattie didn't stop to think, but last few hours-not very pleasant ones, Mitts, Gloves, Fur Caps, &c. bounding up the stairs nearly upset Miss either, if we might judge from flashing Zulime on the topmost step, with the velocity in which she shot by her, and caused that young lady no little indignation at Ned Simpson on a first aquaintance. such conduct in their hired girl.

Now don't be shocked, reader mine that I have pounced upon a hired girl for my heroine, if I may so call her. For hired girls, especially in the country, think themselves equal, it not a little better, sometimes, than their mistresses. Certainly Hattie could boast of twice as much beauty as her young mistress, Miss Zulime Ains worth, the rich farmer's daughter, and had praiseworthy endeavors of his own, gained as many beaux as you could shake a stick an introduction to the Ainsworths, and at. "But such country bumpkins," she pecame on familiar footing with the soliloquizes, as she stood panting and family, paying open attention to the breathless before her little glass, in her daughter and secret to the maid changing own room, druming with her fingers on the table, and peeping coquettishly at her maid in a more modest fashion. Ah, indeed, it would have caused a smile on anybody's face, if they could purity, even in thought, and her horror, have peeped in on Hattie's day dreams that bright summer afternoon, sitting and rocking gently to and fro by the open window, and all caused by the simple remark on her beauty.

Ah, what a vain set we all are if we could only see ourselves as we see others. Suddenly, a sturdy, manly young felling on the table, and springing from her low passed along under the window, and looking up, caught sight of Hattie, smiled ing also, she stood the very picture of an brightly, kissed his hand, and walked slowly out of sight.

Hattie reddened, and drew herself away from the window. It was Johnny Dudly, her affianced husband, and she felt in no humor to see him then. Indeed, she was beginning to regret her engagement already.

"Ah, Hattie, Hattie," something seemed and in doing so she beheld Johnny Dudly, whispering in her ear, perhaps it was her lover, her protector she felt then, apconscience, "do not thus turn from proaching on his usual evening visit. With Johnny—true, noble-hearted Johnny a wild cry of joy she sprang through the Dudly—a warm heart beats beneath that low window, and up the lawn, reaching rough home-spun jacket-s heart that the gate just in time to throw her arms loves the very ground you walk upon, round John's neck, and with her face hideven though it does not belong to you!"
