Little Faster.

Said the Train Was Too Slow, and it Took Three Men to Undeceive Him -Terriffic Struggle on the Engine.

A Chatham, N. Y., special to the New York Herald, says: "The conductor, engineer and fireman of the Boston express, bound west, on the Boston and Albany railroad, had a desperate encounter with a passenger, who had become insane, and boarding the locomotive, announced his intention of running the train to suit himself. The train is known as No. 23. It was drawn by locomotive No. 230, one of the newest and most powerful on the road. Engineer Edward Maggs, of Albany, was at the throttle; fireman Chester Wiltz was his helper, and conductor H.K. Wilson, of West Springfield was in charge of the train. Wilson's run begins at Springfield, and he took command at five ninutes after six last evening. One of the compartments of sleeper 452 was occupied by a muscular, well built man, more than six feet tall, apparently about twenty-eight years old, and wearing a somewhat thin dark beard. He was a through passenger from Boston, and was only to return to his seat with a look of nnovance on his face. He fidgeted about in his seat every time the train stopped, and once or twice remarked to his neighbors that the train seemed to Conductor Wilson was passing through the smoking car just after the train had stranger sitting there and smoking. The young man tapped the conductor's elbow, and said quietly: "Conductor, may I fol-

Wilson thought the request a strange one nothing very unusual in his conduct until the train had left Springfield, except that two commercial travellers who sat behind him had noticed that the man was very restless, frequently pacing hurriedly forward to the end of the vestibuled sleeper, but he smiled pleasantly and said, "Certainly." As Wilson passed conductor Barker, of the parlor car service, a moment later, however, he said: "That man is a little off, I think. He will bear watching." A passenger, who overheard the remark told the conductor that the young man was all right. He knew him by sight as Dr. G. L. Barney, of the Harvard Medical School, a very promising young physician. Dr. Barney followed the conductor as far as the baggage car and then said, "Conductor, why are we going so slowly, Can't we push this thing along a little livelier?" Wilson glanced at his watch. "We are on time, sir," he said in a conciliatory

"That may be," Dr. Barney retorted, "but I think I could run this train faster Not long after the train pulled up at State Line. Wilson swung his lantern, the signal for engineer Maggs to start, after a few passengers had disembarked. To his surprise, the train did not move. Then he heard the engineer calling for him and ran forward to see what was the

There stood Dr. Barney clutching the hand-rail of the locomotive and TRYING TO DRAW HIMSELF UP INTO THE CAB. "This man won't leave the engine," said engineer Maggs.

As Dr. Barney saw the conductor and one or two brakemen coming, he jumped lightly from the step of the engine and resumed his seat in the sleeping car. When the express rolled into Chatham at six minutes to nine o'clock, conductor Wilson started forward to tell the engineer what he thought about Dr. Barney. The engineer sat at his post, leaning from the cab window, directly above Wilson. Fireman Wiltz had stepped out of the cab, and was listening to the conductor's account of Barney's eccentricities. The only light was a faint glimmer that came from a little lamp in the locomotive cab and the rays from the conductor's hand lantern. Suddenly an agile form darted forward from the shadow of the tender, and fireman Wiltz, who had his back turned toward the tender, felt himself grasped about the body with a clutch that would have been a credit to the champion tackler of a Yale football team. Wiltz was taken by surprise,. He grasped feebly at the engine to save himsely, but, with a mighty lift, Dr. Barney had picked him up bodily. For an instant the fireman's body was poised as a wrestler lifts his antagonist, and then Barney put forth all his maniac strength and hurled the fireman away above his head. Wiltz came down on the coal in the tender and lay there stunned by the shock.

Conductor Wilson, who was on the opposite side of the locomotive, and engineer Maggs both sprang for the maniac, who having easily disposed of Wiltz, already had his foot in the cab and was reaching for the engineer. "Stand back," shouted the insane
