The Awakening of Ireland.

The New Statesman gave a special supplement last week on "The Awakening of Ireland," which is of special interest at a moment when the Irish Home Rule Bill has again been passed by the House of Commons and rejected by the Lords.

"Nothing," says the Nation, "but the defeat of the Government on a non-Irish issue can now stay its passage into law. So long as the three political bodies which form the coalition do not desire such a defeat, and are vigilant enough to avert it, it cannot take place. But Lord Lansdowne met Lord Grey's motion for the second reading on Monday with a refusal to consider the Bill until it has been referred to the country."

The New Era.

"What ever may happen in the immediate future with regard to Home Rule, Ireland stands to-day at the beginning of a new era in her history," says the New Statesman. "During the last two decades there has taken place in Ireland that most fundamental and far-reaching of revolutions—a redistribution of property. The redistribution is very far from being complete or final, as the Dublin Parliament will doubtless learn almost as soon as it assembles, but none the less it has altered the face of Ireland, and cannot fail to be a landmark in her history only second in importance to the English conquest. It has more-over, been accompanied by a veritable revival in the intellectual and artistic life of the country, and lately by a great development of co-operative enterprise which, having regard to its spiritual as well as its material results, many observers regard as the most momentous change of all."

Mr. George Russell (A.E.) tells the story of this co-operative movement in Ireland which has had such remarkable results.

"In Ireland for the last quarter of a century," says Mr. Russell, "two revolutions have been going on, overlapping each other. One, connected with the ownership of land, was at its height when the other, connected with the reorganisation of agricultural industry, was in its infancy."

Co-operation and Civilisation.

"The divine and the infernal powers alike appear in unexpected ways, now in mangers and now in poodle, as when Mephistopheles chose first to appear to Faust. But a steam separator to conceal the seed of a new civilisation! 'A most strange case of the kind,' as Dr. Faust would have said. Nobody except Signor Plunkett who knew very well what he was doing, would have suspected that the steam separator which he so urgently pressed Irish farmers to utilise was dangerous to anything except the manufacturers of the older sort of churn used in home butter making. But the erection of a creamery equipped with the new plant was an expensive undertaking for small farmers, and he advocated the forming of co-operative societies to enable them to obtain the necessary capital."

"Now, co-operation is one of the half-dozen fundamental principles on which it is possible to imagine a civilisation being based. It may be added to the various forms of collectivism, State socialism, guild socialism, and communism as one of the fundamental ideas by the application of which to society a noble civilisation could be organized. The steam separator was a harmless ingredient in Irish national life. Co-operation for such an imaginative and logically-mindful folk as the Irish are was much more indefinable stuff. Once it was adopted it would not be possible to confine it to steam separators."

"As the movement has grown to national dimensions, it has, while improving its economic position, become more humanized. Societies build halls out of their profits, hold concerts or entertainments, run village libraries; and a new organisation, the United Irishwomen, the feminine counterpart of the I. A. O. S., and affiliated to it, has been at work during the past year organising Irish countrywomen, and already about forty associations have been formed. One of the pleasantest things about the movement is this latter development, which is mainly directed to bringing about a higher standard of living in rural districts. The women promote flower shows, exhibitions of home industries, nursing schemes, start industry societies, teach domestic economy and by entertainments and concerts try to bring about a gay life in the desolate Irish countryside."

Killing 100,000 Flies a Day.

The fly season will soon be upon us, and it behoves everyone to take up arms against the common enemy. Here is a simple apparatus which has been responsible for the death of more than 100,000 a day of these winged disease-breeders.

The idea consists of a square or oblong wooden box, with a hinged lid at one end. Smear the inside of it with honey or treacle, and place it on the roof or in the garden, with the lid open. Any fly in the vicinity will speed for the box with all possible speed, and will not want to come out again.

The box will soon begin to buzz like a beehive and the lid should be shut as soon as it is fairly full. Now take the box and plunge it into water and open the lid. The flies are at once drowned, and the box can be used again any number of times.

The inventor of this simple fly trap killed more than 100,000 a day last summer and cleared the whole neighbourhood of these pests in a very short time.

The New Singer for Rossley.

There was a good house at Rossley's last night notwithstanding the many attractions. The pictures are fine; the love romance of the southerner, is a splendid picture that keeps you interested until the finish. There is also another grand story told by picture of the outlaw's dying wife and other graphics and Pathe Weeklies. On Monday night Mr. Theo. Keough, the noted Irish American baritone, will make his first appearance; he has a capital voice and pleasing appearance, his sweet voice and easy manner has made him a big favourite everywhere. Mr. Rossley has some fine acts booked for the near future, all genuine performers of merit.

Fishing Gear Badly Damaged.

S. S. MEIGLE'S REPORT.
The steamer Meigle, Capt. J. Gooble, returned from north at noon yesterday, after experiencing the stormiest trip for the season. The ship, however, made all regular ports between here and Battle Harbor and returned. Strong southwesterly winds, with dense fog and heavy seas were encountered throughout the voyage. In the Straits havoc was wrought among the fishing gear, especially traps on Labrador side between Bradore and Blanc Sablon, and very little was done with codfish at these places the past week. In eastern part of the Straits the westerly gales were not felt so badly and from West-St. Modiste to Cape St. Charles, most trips are doing fairly well, especially so around Chateau and Hentley H. Around Battle Harb., however, the fishery to date is almost a failure. On the Newfoundland side of the Straits from Ferrole to Eddies Cove, every man has a fair voyage ashore. Wm. Geange, of Anchor Point, who is a passenger by the Meigle, is offering for sale for himself and neighbors 4000 quintals of codfish in salt bulk, if a satisfactory price can be obtained. Pike's lobster crews of Chateau and Clarke's of Bonne Bay, who were fishing at Bartlett's Harbor, returned by the Meigle this trip. Western Star.
