MONDAY EVENING, AUGUST 12.

NORAH CUSHALEEN

HAUNTED CASTLE.

'Well, what are we to say?' asked the latter returning Hargreave's look with one of contempt.

'I will satisfy your claim,' said the youth in a tone of cold gravity.

'You,' exclaimed the factor; 'why you are nothing but a poor travelling artist, and how can you pay thirty.five pounds seven and ninepence for another man?'

pounds seven and ninepence for another man?

'That is no business of yours, sir.—
'If I choose to make an effort to get this poor victim from under your claws that does not give you a right to make personal remarks or ask personal questions. Show me your claim on Mr. Cushaleen, and if just, I will settle it.'
'Och, long life to your honour's hon our,' cried Michael, his countenance beaming with joy.
'Sure and its ashamed I am of your kindness,' said Terry, 'but the ould man doesn't owe Masther O'Brady a farthing. It's ail the other way, for every body at Dundarra knows that my father was robbed.'
'I understand what you mean,' inter-was robbed.

'I understand what you mean,' interrupted Hargreaye. 'Of that it is not neccessary to speak. Your claim, sir,' he added turning to O'Brady.

The factor handed him a paper which

The factor handed him a paper which the youth glanced at.

'This,' he observed, 'merely purports to be a receipt from you for the sum named, but it gives no particulars of the debt, how Mr. Cushaleen comes to owe you this sum.'

'Sure and he knows himself,' said O'Brady impatiently. He fell back in the rent and the stock in the farm did not make up the arrears.'

'Oh then he doesn't owe this to you, but to the proprietor of Dundarra,' remarked Hargreave.

'Well, it's all the same. I'm factor on the estate. Everything is under my management.'

management,'
'So I understand,' returned Hargreave gravely. 'But this receipt, to be a proper one, must be signed by you for the landlord.'
'Bah! we don't bother with such things here,' growled O'Brady. 'Your new fangled English notions won't go down in Ireland.'

'Mr. O'Brady,' returned Hargreave, firmly, 'in this instance you have to deal with one who knows what your powers as a factor are. You have the liberty, it would appear, to oppress the tenants, but in certain things there is a law for you as well as for them; and Mr. Cushaleen is not hound to take that arr. law for you as well as for them; and MrCushaleen is not bound to take that sort of a recipit from you. Now, if you choose to make out a regular statement of your claim as factor against him, and bring it here receipted, I will pay you—otherwise you will not be paid, and I shall see that you don't lay a finger on the furniture of this cottage.'
'Who are you? asked O'Brady, considerably astonished.
'Never mind who I am, was the answer. 'Do as I say and receive the money, or take your own course and want it.'
'By jabers, and if making out the ac-money, or take your own course want it.

By jabers, and if making out the account will bring the cash, I'll run up and do it. Larry, you don't go out o' this. Maybe its a dodge to shut the house against us, but mind you don't budge till I return.

'Larry gave a wink and a nod, as much as to say he was wide awake, and knew what he was about. Finding his official assistant so thoroughly alive to his duty, the factor made a quick exit, and took his way up the village towards his residence.

In about an hour he returned with the account made out in full, and Hargreave being now satisfied with it, paid the money into O'Brady's hands. The greedy fingers of the latter closed eager iy over it, and he quietly chuckled over the greenness and simplicity, as he considered them, of the wandering artist.

'Now, sir,' said the youth, 'this releases this old man from your vindictive tyranny. He is at last safe from all your malice. 'Terry,' he added, turning to the young Irishman, 'if Mr. O'. Brady doesn't leave the house in less than two minutes, I would advise you to kick him out.'

'Faix, and it's just myself that would

The factor did not deem it prudent to risk the result, but beat a precipitate retreat, following at the heels of Larry, who had by this time quietly slipped in-treat, following at the treat, following at the who had by this time quietly slipped into the street.

When they were left alone with the youth who had manifested such munificent generosity, Michael and Terry over whelmed him with a torrent of grateful thanks, though the expressions of Terry were interlarded with fierce maledictions, directed against the factor.

'Hargreave received the demonstration with quiet good humour, and when its first force was somewhat exhausted, he asked Michael if he had kept the factor's former receipts.

'Sure and I have, yer honour,' replied the old man.

Then put that beside them, and keep the whole safe. They may prove useful some day.

So saying, Hargreave returned to his room, took up his drawing portfolio, and calling Dash from his slumbers in the corner, went out for a sketching-ramble.

Meanwhile O'Brady had parted from

Meanwhile O'Brady had parted from Larry, and was crossing the common towards the lonely cabin of Mike.

'He advised Ferry to kick me out, did he?' muttered the factor vindictively to himself. 'I'll not forget that, and I'll have revenge on him for it, if he stays long in Dundarra. A fellow like him will be apt to put evil notions into the minds of the tenants; but, by jakers, if I find he's doing that, some way must be fallen on to get rid of him. I wonder who he is. Hatgrenge I am told is not look quite a stranger to me, but who it is he resembles I can't recollect. But let him beware—Jacob O'Brady never yet proved a harmless enemy.'

This morning Darby Herley, was charged by the Chief Constable with lying drunk on the sidewalk. It was his list offence, and the case against him was

A CURIOUS SURGICAL CASE:—The Lancet states that on the night of March the 5th a woman aged forty-two, was brought by her husband into the accident ward of the Middlesex Hospital. She had caught her foot in one of the metal hoops of her crinoline, had fallen down stairs, and had sustained a compound fracture of both bones of her leg below the knee. On account of the severity of her sufferings, it was considered advisable to administer chloroform to her before the fracture was examined; and while she was insensible the shattered limb was amputated by Mr. Lawson, with her husband's assent. The patient recovered rapidly. Being of timid and nervous temperament, she shrank from looking at the injured limb whilst it was being dressed, and it was thought best not to tell her what had befallen her until the fortieth day after the operation, when she first became aware that she had lost her leg.
