but admit that this aspect of the situation was grave in the extreme. He was so hopelessly in the dark about it all. He would not say to himself that his father had treated him unfairly, but—well, was it not strange, the only son never to have had one generous word from the father who had been suddenly enriched; never to have been taken into confidence about those riches; never to have had sight of them; never to have had the littlest share in them?

For this was precisely the footing on which Arthur stood with his father in regard to Kedagh's fortune. In all that concerned his money, Anthony had held his son at arm's length ever since his return home. He had made half promises and promises; he had held out hopes, not one of which had been realized. Since his father had grown to wealth Arthur had been made to feel himself a stranger in the house.

And while it had been thus with him, he had seen, or fancied he had seen, that the place which might have been the son's had little by little been usurped by the stranger Dora. At any rate, it had not, and could not have failed of notice how greatly Dora had been in the confidence of Anthony; as far, sa cast as could be judged by one who had not been in the confidence of Anthony himself.

Touching that vital affair of the money Dora, of course, had never been in Anthony's confidence at all; but it seemed to Arthur that acts pointed quite in the Arthur that acts pointed quite in the opposite direction.

Kitty had run upstairs to whisper an inquiry if she could help Barbara.

"What does Maguire say of your father?" asked Lady Frayne.

"He gives scarcely any hope," answered Arthur.

Lady Frayne sighed again. She was touched on her old friend's behalf, and desperately puzzled about his money. "How did you find things at home?" said Arthur.

"Quiet enough; but not too comfortable."

"Quiet enough; but not too comfortable," answered her ladyship. "We'll be a little while settling down again. Ah! doctor, how is he now?"

The doctor shook his head without speaking.

"Dear, dear," said Lady Frayne, "is it so bad as that?"
"Have you given up all hope, doctor?" asked Arthur.

"You see," said the doctor, "there's no strength left in him; he bled so long before they found him. He can't stand against the fever." "Does he still lose strength?" said Lady Frayne.
"Every minute," answered the doctor

"Every minute," answered the doctor.
"I suppose you know that we had Fitzgerald over yesterday from Dublin, but he said we could do only what I am doing—fight the fever step by step as we can. His mind is wandering in the strangest way;
he has a notion that somebody is taking his money from him."

"Oh," said Lady Frayne, "that's a queer idea for him to have."

"It is," said the doctor; "but there's no idea too queer for delirium."

CHAPTER XLIII.

THERE IS MUCH TO CLEAR UP. Anthony lay a-dying in his chamber.

The end of the death-struggle had become now only a question of hours; the doctor had said that his utmost was done, and had said that his utmost was uone, and that it would avail nothing.

Arthur, tired out with watching, had strolled down to the ruined tower. It was the first time that he had taken a fair surthe first time that he had taken a fair survey of the wreck that the storm had wrought. Nothing had been touched there since the night when Anthony was carried in to his death-bed. The wintry sun glimmered on the desolate scene, a scene familiar to Arthur from his boyish days. The destruction of the tower seemed like the destruction of all the old life at Carriconna. He called to mind the legend Carriconna. He called to mind the legend that when the tower fell the head of the old house should fall with it, and there he old house should fall with it, and there he was, standing, under he wreck of it, and every moment expecting the summons to close his father's eyes.

He climbed the broken stairs to the second floor of the tower, which was now its highest, and the wintry panorama lay bare and bleak before him. There was ice at the edges of the lake; he remembered rowing there with Kitari, at rowing there with Kitty in the summer.
Come what might, he had Kitty now, and the thought of her was his best comfort.
Then the image of the future assailed him,
and a vague dread rose up in and filled his

in this way is about $1 50.

The use of nitrogen as an anaesthetic was recently successfully tried in England. Nine patients took the gas, and in every case the result was the production of complete anaesthesia. The pulse was first full and throbbing, then feeble. In the advanced stage the respiration was deep and rapid and there was lividity of the surface, the pupils were dilated, and there was more or less jactitation of the limbs.
