Could there be a more common-sense course? There is no retaliation in a policy so conceived. It is merely an exhibition of what the Scotch would call national spunk. It will be popular in Canada and popular in Great Britain. When aid for works that are of imperial advantage is sought from the imperial authorities, they will no longer urge diffidence because of Canada's discrimination against or lack of consideration for Great Britain. There will be deeds. not words only, to show the desire of the people of Canada for the closest possible relations with the motherland. There will be a growing tendency on the part of British statesmen to influence investment of capital in Canadian enterprises. And all this can be accomplished, without so much as the exchange of a cross word with our neighbors in the United States, to trade with whom, at their convenience we will always be ready, though it does not follow that business once diverted into another channel, because of their exclusive policy, will again flow over the border. The result of the first McKinley Bill, indeed, was to divert trade to Great Britain, which continued to go across the Atlantic after that high tax measure was repealed by the Wilson Bill.

I am told that many United States Senators see in the new McKinley Bill a number of provisions that will be hurtful to the people of the republic, and the measure will no doubt be amended in some respects.
