IN LOVE'S BONDAGE

A NOVEL BY MRS. EDWARD KENNARD

strong current, which tore from one descent to another at a racing rate, and made it a wonder how any living thing could contend against it. Now, on the left side of the pool—that on which Harry and Jens were seated, was a round, black rock, worn perfectly smooth by the action of the water. It protruded about a couple of feet. All the other rocks were already covered, so rapidly had the river risen.

Presently the seal tried to clamber on to its slippery surface, which afforded the only convenient resting place within reach. Jens put his finger to his lips as a warning signal, and he and his companion remained quite motionless. So quiet were they that the seal seemed quite unconscious his movements were being watched by two pairs of sharp human eyes. At all events he took no notice of their steady gaze. Once, twice, thrice he fell headlong into the surging waves which ran up the sides of the boulder like hungry living things. The fourth time he succeeded and slowly dragged his fat sleek body on to the wet stone. It was just large enough to allow of his stretching his limbs, or rather fins, at full length, and he lay there looking the picture of content, blinking his eyes with an expression of lazy good humor, as the rain-drops fell upon them and trickled down his cheeks.

"Oh, for a gun!" This thought flashed simultaneously through the minds of both spectators, as they beheld what a tempting shot he presented. The sight, indeed, was more than Jens could withstand. He seized the gaff, crept noiselessly down the bank, sheltering himself behind every friendly bush and stone, then suddenly rushed into the water past his waist, and reaching forward as far as he could, with one quick stroke of his long arm made a lunge at the disappearing seal whose fears had been aroused just half a second too soon. It was a gallant attempt. Jens only missed him by an eighth of an inch, but he was nearly carried off his feet by the raging stream, and retired to the bank disappointed, and considerably wetter than when he left it. He seemed almost like an amphibious animal, judging by the fearless way he splashed in on every occasion.

Fortunately his slow, tenacious mind, when once thoroughly aroused, was not to be discomfited by trifles and he now bethought himself of an ancient peasant, who lived in a hut, perched high up amongst the rocks, on the opposite side of the river. This individual being a great hunter, and having according to report, actually in former days killed a "typer" (platymer) flying, possessed a rusty old, brass-bound, wooden weapon, which he dignified with the name of rifle.

Struck by this happy thought, Jens marched off, crossed the bridge higher up, and went in search of him. Dietrich Landmark was at home and willing to lend the antiquated firearm, which he viewed with such pride and fond affection, but a slight difficulty arose. He had no bullets ready, and was under the necessity of retiring to his back premises in order to forge a couple. This operation took a considerable time, and Harry began to grow tired of waiting, and to wonder what Jens could be about. At length, however, he reappeared, shouldering the loaded rifle in triumph, and followed by the venerable Dietrich, who, interested in all sporting matters was still keen. Meantime the seal, after the fright he had received, seemed permanently to have quitted the rock and recommenced fishing.

For the best part of an hour he kept up a most exasperating game of hide and seek, now popping up quite close to his foes, as if they were the most friendly terms, and then disappearing in an incredibly short space of time appearing fifty yards or more away.

There was no chance of getting a shot at him. He took provokingly good care of that.

At length, when the patience of the watchers was rapidly becoming exhausted, he once more approached the rock. It was an anxious moment. Their hopes and fears were about equally balanced. Would or would he not rest on it again?

Yes. He tries to scramble up as before, fails—for his strength is somewhat exhausted, but finally succeeds. Now is the opportunity. Harry, not knowing the capabilities of the strange old flint-lock, motions to Jens to fire. The latter creeps steadily forward among the low juniper bushes that line the bank, making as little noise as possible, and proceeding with the caution of a Red Indian. Thank goodness the seal lies motionless. He is evidently fatigued by his recent exertions, and suspects no danger.

A breathless pause ensues. Then—ping goes the bullet as it whistles through the air and wakes every echo within twenty miles, rumbling like thunder among the mountains.

"By Jove! he has missed him. No, he hasn't. Bravo, bravo," cries Harry, starting to his feet in frantic excitement, as the poor seal tumbles sideways with a dull thud into the river and there lies struggling. Jens drags him to the bank and gives him his coup de grace. In another minute the water for yards around, is dyed red with his blood, as it comes out from the deep gash across his throat, inflicted by Jens' sharp blade. The

All That's Good in Meats

47 GAUKEL STREET, BERLIN

It is well established that man cannot live by bread alone, and while there is a small contingent of us who believe in the principle of vegetarianism, the large majority demands that the table be covered with meat of some kind. The housewife pays to this branch of her requisariat the greatest attention and demands that she be served with the juiciest of roasts, the tenderest of steaks, the choicest in cuts and the best in hog products, and the dealer who comes closest to her ideal in his respect, is the one to whom her custom goes. In Berlin, she is well served by Mr. W. J. McCutcheon, whose model market is at No. 47, Gaukel street, opposite the electric plant, is one of the handsomest in the city. It is fitted with marble topped counters, spacious racks and patent cutting blocks admirably lighted and always kept scrupulously clean. In connection he has an ample cold storage house, where his meats are kept. He does both wholesale and retail business, handling only the best quality home dressed beef, pork, veal, mutton and lamb and his own sugar cured hams and bacon.

His sausages, lards and hog products are all homemade. He also carries a large stock of canned goods, and makes a specialty of fresh eggs and prime butter. His business was established in 1905.

The office is connected with phone 460 and orders received in this way are promptly delivered by the firm's own teams. Mr. McCutcheon is an expert judge of meats, does all his own buying, and is thus enabled to give the customers the best at the lowest prices. He is one of the representative and substantial business men of this city, an active worker for her welfare, and socially is widely popular.
