Railroads are not playthings; are not created for amusement, and in perhaps nine cases out of ten they represent great dividend paying properon why the M & V. B. line should prove an exception to the rule and may be sure that the public interest is being well served, for a paying railroad traffic means always a business development from which the public rier is not deriving the only profit. There is no combination of railway interests here as yet to induce a advantage. The cost of the right-ofway to the county is not a serious matter, though it represents a hystem of bonusing that is not at all times commendable. At this stage, in provincial development it would be hard to find a financial corporation

The bonusing system may be an iquitous one but the example has been set and established by continuous usage and until population and scheme calculated to give the pub lie the maximum profit without substantial consideration. . The people have the best end of the railway partnership and we hear few complaints from communities that have invested a right-of-way to secure a railroad. With proper proportions of money and influence the natural advantages of the projected line through this county may be utilized in the rapid establishment of an important highway of portance of the route is perhaps small but its connections have possibilities that are not generally understood. -The dangerous sickness of the un-crowned ming has been the cause for hope that the rejoicings of a corona-tion day need not be much longer postponed. A postponed coronation is not of itself a matter for general lament. Man only proposes even in the throne room of the greatest na-tion on earth. The accident that upsets the plan of the meanest subject, and the illness of the King, are but the direction of a stronger hand. The wolly like the teaching staff of Acadia for day is not a calamity and if his restoration to health is permitted, the rejoicing of the people will be accentuated when the event transpires. Of a personal and inherited popularity, a broad minded, thorough statesman and diplomatist. Edward VII embodies the perfection of the ideal monarch, and his people are waiting for liberty to sanction and celebrate his coronation with an enthusiasm of which the history of the nation will not furnish a parallel. The British people are strangely content with their government and the growth of the republican idea, that in its proper expression of a king of a history of the nation will not furnish a parallel. The British people are strangely content with their government and the growth of the republican idea, that in its proper expression constitutes the true measure of public liberty, seems to have received no encouragement in that land of Kings. A republic in which the people do not rule, and a monarchy in which the people do rule are rather anomalous conditions of statehood, and yet they exist and of the latter Great Britian furnishes the most prominent example. Though the laws are written over the sign manual of a King, the tracings of a tyrant never appear, for royalty is hedged about with limitations of the people's making. The King is but the representative man of the nation, a mouth-piece wholly free from party taint, simplifying the question of government and restraining the corruption that seems in such disgraceful evidence wherever political party influences seek the advantage of an elective head. Englishmen have no fault to find what the law of inheritance as applied to the royal family and there is a greater measure of common sense mingled with their sentianent in the somewhat farcical coronation ceremonies than may be experselly admitted. They will probably always be satisfied with a King so long as their kingdom is governed in the interests of the people to the complete elimination of the class rule that has such an evil effect under republican forms of government. The people are praying for the recovery of the King everywhere in the Empire and wherever the English language is spoken. There is strong hope for his recovery and in the event of his restoration to health it is unlikely that the coronation ceremonies will be delayed longer than is absolutely necessary.
