London Has Strong Appeal As Place in Which to Live

References recently made in these columns to the apparent lack of results in the campaign to secure new industries for London will bear some qualification in view of facts that have been made

It is quite apparent that the industrial department is now engaged in work the character of which must necessarily be withheld from publication until negotiations have been carried on by stages of development to their logical conclusion. Several new industries in addition to the Republic Truck Company, will come to London within a short time, but the question of securing property is an important one that is now receiving consideration. The city voted a sum of money at the last municipal election for this purpose, but great eare has to be exercised in the selection of prowhile this country was at war has been established Difference of opinion is bound to occur, and those concerned with the direction of industries The existence has been proven of a coterie must be consulted. The appropriate to the man old thing, in the eyes, of all masculine charms and virtues—if this he didn't really love him, but had fibbed in saying that she loved no one in the pretty girls if she refused him. Maud had thought it all out in her eighteen-year-old mind. She was quite sure that the case was hopeless and that she was resident that she herself had arrived at the place where she must decide between a life of resigned spinsterdom or the alternative of marrying the man she merely liked.

This was Walter, Walter who had come up to her mother's country place to press his suit with considerable persistence. Maud had assured Walter that she didn't really love him, but had fibbed in saying that she loved no one if the remains of one, just behind Vimy Ridge.
