The Broken Circle!

CHAPTER XXI.

The Duke and Duchess of Rosedene, with their visitors, were at Dene Abbey, within sight and sound of the ever-murmuring sea. Miss Hatton had the whole day to herself; she had no great household to manage as at Brentwood, she had no care about the entertainment of visitors; the long, bright hours were hers, to spend as she would.

Lady Maude Trevor had gladly accepted the duchess' invitation; but pretty May Lason had promised to pay a visit elsewhere, and could not break her engagement. The military element had dispersed. Sir Basil Carlton had been delighted with her grace's proposal to join the party at the Abbey. He liked the duchess; her kindly gracious manner pleased him; he was touched by her great kindness to himself, although he did not know the cause. He did not go with the party from Brentwood, but he followed them in a few days. It was a wonderful change from the green, sweet woodlands of Warwickshire, to the country bordering on a sunny southern sea.

Dene Abbey was a very old house one that hundreds of years before had belonged to an ancient order of friars. Bluff King Harry took possession of it, and gave it to one of his favorite courtiers. In course of time it came into the hands of the Rosedene family, who valued highly the grand old mansion and magnificent estate. The duchess always insisted upon spending a few months there every year. Modern rooms and modern luxuries had been added to the old mansion, but it still retained enough of its antiquity to be one of the show places of England.

From the windows, from the terraces, from the grassy knolls in the park—from every part, the sea was visible.

Dene lay in Sussex, near the little town of Southwood, which was a favorite watering-place. When calm, the water of the Channel lay like a fair mirror in the distance. When it was rough, the foam and the dashing spray seemed almost to envelop the Abbey.

There had been nothing wanting in the poetry of Leah's love-story; but if anything could deepen the romance of it, it was certainly the presence of the beautiful, restless, heaving sea.

The duchess had but one notion of pleasing her guests at Dene, and it was to give them perfect liberty. Some liced the woods, some the yellow sands, some the ever-changing sea. They went where they liked and did as they liked, which was the great charm of the place.

So Sir Basil, who liked the sea, and Leah, whose passionate soul delighted in it, were often on the beach together. They enjoyed the firm, yellow sands, the dancing, crested waves, the tall white cliffs covered with luxuriant vegetation, the briny odor of the sea-breeze, the pretty shells and pebbles on the beach, the seaweed which drifted with the waters. They spent long hours together listening to the music of the waves and talking of the beauty that lay around. And during this time, while the sea-gulls whirled in the air, while the southern wind kissed the waves, the heart of the girl who loved Sir Basil became so entirely his, her life so wholly wrapped in his, that death would have been easier than to see him pass out of it.

The duchess remarked it, and mourned over it, but did not interfere—it was too late. But she said to herself over and over again that it was ten thousand pities Leah had so much romance in her nature; she would have been so much happier had she been more like ordinary girls.

The evenings at Dene were delightful. The drawing-room was an immense apartment, containing five large windows. From them one stepped on to a smooth, green lawn; and from the lawn a short path led through the woods to the cliffs and the shifting water, the effect was dazzling. Then the duchess liked the lamps to be lowered and the windows all thrown open, when the wind, laden with sweet odors from land and sea, came in.

One evening the moon shone unwontedly bright; in the distance the sea looked like molten silver—it was a night to fill all hearts with an undefined sense of passionate longing.

"Let us have some music," said the duchess, as she leaned back in her chair. "Leah, let us hear you sing."

Then from out of the soft shadows appeared Leah's tall graceful figure enveloped in sweeping folds of black lace. She went quietly to the piano. The white, slender hands moved gently over the keys; the beautiful face grew fairer as the passionate world fell from her lips. She sang:

My heart is like a singing bird
Whose nest is in a watered shoot;
My heart is like an apple-tree
Whose boughs are bent with thick-set fruit;
My heart is like a rainbow shell
That paddles in a halcyon sea;
My heart is gladder than all these
Because my love is come to me.

Raise me a dais of silk and down;
Hang it with hair and purple dyes;
Carve it in doves and pomegranates
And peacocks with a hundred eyes;
Work it in gold and silver grasses,
In leaves and silver fleur-de-lys,
Because the birthday of my life
Is come—my love is come to me.

"She did not heed who was in the room. The words sprung as it were from her heart to her lips. She was thinking just at that time more of her love than of her lover—this golden-winged love that had taken her captive and stolen her heart.

Sir Basil came quietly to her side. "Those are quaint lines, Miss Hatton," he said. "Whose are they?" There was no music on the piano, and it struck him suddenly that both words and notes were impromptu. "I believe," he added, impulsively, "that they are your own."

The white fingers wandered over the keys. She made no answer; she was wondering whether he had guessed her secret at last.

"My love is come to me"—the words started her when she came to think of their truth.

Sir Basil left the piano and went back to his chair, which was placed outside the long French windows. He thought more of Leah than he had ever thought before. He remembered all that the duchess had told him of her fanciful idea, that she would be able to recognize her ideal lover the moment she saw him; and now she sung that he had come. Was it really so? He looked round on the men sitting apart in little groups; there was not one he considered worthy of her. He never thought of himself. Each time that night that his eyes fell on her fair face the words came back to him: "My love is come to me."

She was more shy and timid with him after that. She avoided him a little, but loved him just as much. She would have gone through fire and water for him; she would have made any sacrifice for him. The marvel was that the young baronet never dreamed of the conquest he had made. As for Leah, she had not yet begun to doubt; she felt certain that his love would be hers in the fulness of time.

A little incident happened shortly after this which changed the current of their lives and hurried on events.

Sir Arthur Hatton was a stranger to all fair love-dreams and sweet fancies. Lady Bourgoyne had married him without giving him any trouble; his comfortable affection for her had never caused him a pang. That he should understand a nature or a love like Leah's was not to be expected; but he was one day the unwilling witness of a little scene that opened his eyes.

In the library stood a large Japanese screen, and Sir Arthur enjoyed nothing more than placing this round one of the great bay-windows and intrenching himself therein with his newspaper. Every one knew his whim and smiled at it. People went into the library to search for books, read the newspapers, and write their letters, without paying the least attention to him. It was the only room in the house where he was free from the lively chatter and laughter of the girls, or the gossip of the older women.

One morning there was some Indian news in the Times which interested him greatly—letters written by fellow-officers whose opinions he valued highly. He wished to be undisturbed, so he betook himself to his favorite retreat. He found the library cool and empty; the sun-blinds were all drawn, the light was dim and pleasant. He placed the screen round his favorite window. "Thank goodness," he said to himself, "that I shall now be able to read in peace!"

Sir Arthur had hardly settled himself comfortably, however, before the duchess came in.

She looked over the screen. "I shall not disturb you, general," she said. "A man deep in his morning newspaper is to me as formidable as a lion in his lair. Indian news, I believe!"

"And very bad news," answered Sir Arthur, briefly.

The duchess read for about half an hour, and then went away. Presently Lady Maude Trevor entered, and, sitting down, wrote letter after letter without a single thought as to whether any one was in the room. She was not in the least surprised when the general, in turning his newspaper, betrayed his presence. Then came his Grace of Rosedene.

"I do not like the Indian news this morning," he said. "If Government is not more on the alert, we shall have another terrible rising, I fear."
