Corsets Sweet as a Rose.

Tea is no sooner over than Bob begins to fumble for his pipe, and while searching his pockets he emits a suppressed whistle.

"By Jove!" he says, "I've got something for you. Guess what it is. I'd nearly forgotten it."

"Quite, you mean?" says Paula. "What is it? A pair of gloves? I do hope it is! My only pair are in the most dilapidated state. It is gloves, Bob?" she comes and puts her arm round his neck.

"No, my dear," he says, "I've got something for you. Guess what it is. I'd nearly forgotten it."

"Oh, Bob," she says, with a quick reproach, "and you could forget it. I've been busy."

"I met the postman and he begged me to save him the walk up the hill. I told him I should most probably carry it about with me until it was worn out, but, of course, he didn't care. And aren't you going to read it?"

She shakes her head with a faint smile. What, read that with Alice's cold eyes fixed upon her? Read Sir Herrick's letter with other people in the room?

"What a lovely evening it is," she says, with the thinnest attempt at carelessness. "I think I shall go to the stream for a little while, and she goes out."

Yes, by the stream—where they wandered, Rick and she—she will read his letter. She goes to the stump and sits herself, and takes out the letter from her pocket, and looks at it; then she looks round covertly, and puts it to her lips.

It is the first love letter she has ever received. She thinks, with a sudden flush, "What will he say? How will he address her. Will he say, 'My own Paula' or 'My darling'?" She can almost hear his beloved voice speaking to her as she gazes at the envelope.

How strangely he writes, too; it is a round hand, as if he were writing to a lady, and she is a little startled and a little cramped and hard. It is addressed to Miss Pauline Estcourt, Esq., and never, she thinks, called her Pauline.

For another minute—fully a minute she dallies with it as one dallies with a sure and certain delight, reading it up, and reveling in anticipation.

At last she tears the envelope open. As she does so a faint smile begins to arise from the inside; and she smiles with a little wonder that Sir Herrick should use so many stationery. Then she takes out the note and unfolds it, and a great blank falls upon her face; a bitter sense of disappointment that makes her wince and quiver.

It is not from Sir Herrick. It is—she stares open-eyed and pale for a moment, then with a low cry of amazement—only amazement at present; there is no time as yet for any other emotion—she reads on.

This is what the note contains, written in a plain hand, that for all its roundness, is a woman's:

"Miss Estcourt.—When two women are being wronged and deceived, it is the duty of the one that discovers it to reveal it to the other. Duty is something more prompts me to address you. By this time you have turned to the foot of this letter to learn what name I do not cast my warning aside because I choose to hide that name. I am told that she who writes to me in this way is an honest, simple-minded, country girl, with no thought of guile or suspicion of evil. If that be so, then I shall not appeal in vain. Miss Estcourt, you and I have been deceived, and wronged by Sir Herrick. Now, if it be true that he has offered you his love, and promised to make you his wife, that love he had given to me, long, long before he saw you. That love, I believe, is still mine. How can I tell otherwise when he has spent the last three days by my side, as he has spent many and many others before—when he has just left me without a word or look of coldness? I could not credit that he has behaved so dishonourably toward both of us, but that I have heard it from an undeniable source. He cannot love both of us. I cannot think that he has forgotten me or ceased to love me, else why has he left you so soon to return to me? I am told that you are very beautiful, that you have fascinated him—that you will steal him from me; but something, I know not what, whispers to me that you are too good, too pure, too true for that. Am I not right? Do not think me of me that I write thus; you will not think so when I confess and confess with tears of bitter humiliation, that I love him, love him very dearly, notwithstanding his falsity. Miss Estcourt, let him come back to me! He cannot be so much to you as he is to me."

me; you have known him such a little time, while I have known him and loved him so long! I implore you to listen to me, and to grant my prayer, for his, for yours, for my sake! Oh, let him come back to me! I know that by writing to you I am placing my fate in your hands, but I feel that I can trust it there. You will not betray me, will you? It is not I who have wronged you; it is he, though unwittingly, who has injured me. I cannot write any more; I scarcely know what I have written, but I will send it—I will trust you."

"That is all. No signature, no trace as to whence the blow has come, no sign of the hand that has thrust the dagger at Paula's quivering heart."

Motionless, she sits staring at the letter, but seeing it not; a great thick veil seems to have dropped before her eyes, shutting out the good heaven—the golden sky; an intense stillness and awful hush seem to have fallen on the world, and only the pleading words ring in her ears, as though she could hear the heart of the letter itself.

"It is a lie—a cruel, wicked lie! Yes, that is what it must be, and she looks again with infinite self-scorning. 'I was taken in by it—actually taken in by it,' she exclaims, 'wretching out her hands as if from a palpable listener. 'I was, indeed, but only for the moment. Oh, how could she, whoever she is, do it? Who could it be? Whom have I wronged that she should pay me such a cruel trick?'"

Swiftly, suddenly, the question seems to demand an answer. Yes, who can have done it? Some woman, that for a certainty. Then—And she feels the doubt growing upon her, an awful, shuddering horror falls upon her, and she puts up her hands as if to ward it off.

What is it the woman says? Ask him whose is the portrait he wears in his pocket? Ask him where he spent the last three days? Ask him why he left her, Paula, so suddenly? Why—why—this woman knows that he has some such portrait—knows where he has been—knows that he left her! She must, or she would not dare to write thus. [To be continued.]

Hunters' Excursions to Muskoka and New Ontario Points Via Canadian Pacific Ry.

The Canadian Pacific Railway announces single fare for the round trip to all the big hunting grounds of Muskoka, New Ontario and Central Ontario, with liberal stop-over privileges. Call on W. ## BROUGHTON THE FATHER OF BOXING Formulated Set of Rules in 1743 --Held Championship--Met Waterloo in 1850.

John Broughton may be called the father of modern boxing. He was born in 1704, and before he reached manhood established a boxing booth on Tottenham Court road in London, Eng., the sport was scarcely known.

Of course, in ancient Greece there was a game of extremely brutal character, in which the contestants mounted one another with iron disks until one was rendered insensible or killed, generally the latter; but this has no relation whatever to modern boxing in any way. Combats with weapons, swords, javelins and the like were the popular thing in all ages and continued so in England until about the time of George I., when the sword combats began to fall into disfavor as a sport, and while the populace was still chasing strange gods in the hope of finding another pastime to fill its place John Broughton was born and grew to manhood. It may be that details of some kind between unarmed men may have been held before he appeared on the scene, but it wasn't until he formulated a set of rules that modern boxing was given birth to right to call its existence begun.

This occurred in 1743, and in them for the first time was a rest period between short intervals of fighting in order that the contestants could be refreshed. Broughton's system continued to flourish for many years and he himself the champion boxer of England.

In 1750, however, he met his Waterloo in an encounter with a butcher named Slack, a man who had never entered a boxing ring before, but who landed one punch on Broughton's nose and never won back his lost laurels and lived for 39 years in complete obscurity before the days of his championship he had enjoyed the favor of the Duke of Cumberland and others of royal and noble blood, and through the patronage had amassed a snug fortune.

MISS MCKAY WON LADIES' PRIZE

Defeated Miss Dod, the English Champion, in the Contest for World's Honors.

The ladies' national golf championship of the United States was held yesterday at Philadelphia by Miss Pauline McKay, of Boston, who defeated Miss Charlotte Dod, of New England, in the premier golf play. Miss McKay is a young golfer, and although it was not her first time, she was a very successful one.

At Hammond it was learned that Paul Velder, a player on the high school team, suffered an untimely death at the bottom of a pile of his company's lumber. The cause of the accident was a fall from a tree.

EVERY BOWLER SHOULD RESPOND

Appeal to the Members of Club to Donate to Charity Tournament.

The following letter has been received: "To the members of the London Bowling Club, Thistle Club and Asylum Club; Sirs,—Being anxious that there should be a large number of members to be held on the lawn of the club, we are holding a charity tournament on Friday afternoon of this week, on Friday, October 12th, at 2:30 o'clock. We beg to again remind you that your presence is most desired, and that we may have a successful meeting, we are sure that you will all appreciate the fact that there are little ones who are entirely dependent upon the generosity of the members of the club.
