In the day time he ran in a small lot adjoining the course. The inclosure was about 150 yards of the inside track, reaching from the judges' stand along the homestretch. There was a pacing race and a trot the same afternoon. When the pacers were scoring Longfellow would "shack" back with them, wheel when they did, and lead the field as far as the confining fence would permit. When the trotters started he was contented to watch them, without any desire to take part in the fight. any desire to take part in the fight.

Letters from Simla report the death of Capt. F. J. Thompson, well known to Anglo Indians for his passion for sport, which had acquired for him the name of "Shikari Thompson." Since he was invalided in 1882 Capt. Thompson had led for the most part a solitary life in the jungle, supporting himself chiefly by his gun, and only coming to the station occasionally to supply himself with articles which he required. He never failed, however, to appear at Simla about Christmas time in order to raise funds for supplying the inmates of charitable institutions there with a Christmas feast. Capt. Thompson entered the service in 1836, served with the Second European Bengal Fusileers during Sir Chas. Napier's campaign against the Hill tribe in Scinde; he also served during the Punjaubl campaign at the passage of the Chenah and the battles of Chilianwalia and Gooierat.
