

ever, acts in the spirit of reform; and any one who will recommend practical improvement to it, will not be molested. The Government is extremely desirous to obtain information of every addition to human knowledge; and is not alarmed at having its subjects informed concerning the advances in the arts, sciences, and in social life, which are made in other countries.

The increase in knowledge, and the mental activity called forth in Prussia, however, have produced their natural effects. The people desire to enjoy the privilege of taking a part in the management of their own affairs; and so much of the genuine spirit of despotism continues to animate the King, that he is alarmed at this dawning of public independence. He has begun to fear that he has gone too far in education, and those who counsel the application of the Conservative principle, are more favourably listened to than the advocates of additional educational advancement. I was told by excellent authority that Mr Von Raumer has lost Court favour, in consequence of writing so favourably as he did of the beneficial effects of Parliamentary Reform in England; and one of the best informed men in Berlin in regard to education, said, that the instruction provided for females in the Prussian system, had been found very defective, and that proposals had been made to improve it, but had met with great resistance. I communicated to one of the Councillors who form the Privy Council of the Minister of Public Instruction, the subjects taught to the young ladies of Edinburgh in the Great Stuart Street Institution, and he expressed great interest in the plan. He said that some of his fellow councillors and himself desired a similar improvement in Prussia; but he feared that they had many obstacles to surmount before they could succeed.

Many persons will probably believe that an active, enlightened, and reforming Government like that of Prussia, although despotic, is a very excellent institution. There is no Bishop of Exeter to throw rubbish before the wheels of reform, and the Government can accomplish in a day what it would cost seven years of speeches, and pamphlets, and leading articles to bring about in England; but this is a shallow conclusion. Individual mind is chained in Prussia unless it entails itself into the service of the King. In the conversations which I enjoyed with several able men, capable of writing and acting, I often asked, "Why does nobody urge such and such a measure, which you tell me is much wanted?" The answer invariably was,—"Here an individual can do nothing. There is no parliament, no public, no power, but that of the King, and we all feel that it is needless to agitate; for we should only suffer, and no one would assist us." In Britain every man to whom Providence has given talents, feels that he has power. His power is that of influencing opinion; and if he succeeds in making a great impression, he may render practical the objects which he advocates. In Prussia great talents and mental activity are a misfortune, unless they take one direction; and to one who has enjoyed the freedom of thought, action, and influence, which Britain affords, Prussia, with all her improvements, presents the aspect of a moral prison. On said basement story to the rear of his House is a large Shed or building, extending to the barn, forty-five feet, said Barn is thirty six feet, by thirty feet, and commodiously fitted with stalls and other improvements for stabling purposes—in the rear of, and connecting with these buildings, is an Acre of land running back to Pagan-street, under the highest cultivation as a garden.

No. 2.—A property in rear of number One, fronting on Pagan-street, in the highest cultivation, containing one acre and two perches.

This is one of the most desirable locations in that part of the country; there is 200 acres of land, a great part of which is under cultivation, with a good House and out-houses thereon, and the premises extend across the branch to the proportion of about one third of the property, and only about nine miles from the town.
